Twenty-eight of the nominees have been confirmed by the Senate, all but four of them since Sept. 11, after passing through the Senate Judiciary Committee controlled by Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), according to a tally kept by the Justice Department.

The nominations, hearings and confirmations have been fraught with political infighting and dramatic gestures.

Last fall, as the U.S. war on terrorism hit high gear, Senate Republicans led by Lott took a break to make speeches condemning Democrats for not moving fast enough on Bush's choices for judges. Republicans even temporarily blocked the foreign appropriations bill sponsored by Leahy to force Democrats to move more quickly.

Meanwhile, Leahy attempted to demonstrate his willingness to move ahead by holding a hearing on Pickering even though the Senate office buildings closed that day because of the anthrax scare. The hearing was held in the Capitol.

Committee Democrats forced Pickering to provide more information and go through a second hearing because he has published only 95 opinions in 11 years on the bench. That's too few to determine his qualifications, said Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.).

Republicans charged that Democrats were influenced by liberal groups.

Pickering should be blocked because he "has a troubling record on civil rights and reproductive choice" that is "emblematic" of Bush nominees, according to Alliance for Justice.

Leahy's committee is expected to hold a second hearing on Pickering the first week of February.

President Picks Local Jurist for New Federal Judgeship

By Jon Burstein and Rafael Lorente

Sun-Sentinel

Thursday, January 24, 2002

A Palm Beach County Circuit judge is one step closer to taking a seat on the federal bench.

Circuit Judge Kenneth Marra was one of 24 judicial nominees for slots nationwide whose names were forwarded Wednesday by President Bush to Capitol Hill. The president has picked Marra to fill a newly created judgeship for the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Florida. "I am humbled and honored by President Bush's nomination of me to a position on the United States District Court," Marra said in a statement. "I look forward to completing the nomination process before the United States Senate and to the many challenges that await me as a United States District Judge."

Bush also nominated Miami lawyer Jose Martinez to replace Senior U.S. District Judge Edward Davis in Miami.

Both nominees went through the 22-member Southern District Judicial Nominating Commission chaired by former Gov. Bob Martinez. They also have been interviewed and approved by Florida's Democratic U.S. Sens. Bob Graham and Bill Nelson.

Support from home-state senators is crucial for nominees to successfully navigate the confirmation process.

"Given their qualifications and with the support of those two home-state senators, I'm confident they will be confirmed quickly," said Alberto Gonzalez, White House legal counsel.

Gonzalez said there is one more empty seat in the southern district that the White House hopes to fill soon.

The lifetime appointments pay $150,000 a year.

Marra, 50, has been a circuit judge since 1996, serving in the civil, family and criminal divisions. Before that, he spent 12 years practicing commercial litigation with the law firm of Nason, Gildan, Yeager, Gerson & White.

The New York City native got an undergraduate degree from State University of New York, Stony Brook in 1973. He graduated first in his class at Stetson University College of Law in St. Petersburg in 1977.

Liberals Challenge Judicial Nominee; Argue Bush Would 'Pack' Courts With Foes of Civil Rights

By Audrey Hudson
The Washington Times
Thursday, January 24, 2002

Liberal groups today will highlight the record of a conservative judge as part of their campaign to tarnish President Bush's judicial nominees as right-wingers who will "seriously threaten the rights of all Americans."

Such organizations as People for the American Way, the National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League, the Alliance for Justice and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights plan a press conference on the "problematic record" of Mississippi District Judge Charles W. Pickering.

"Many of President Bush's nominees to the appellate courts, recommended by the Federalist Society and other right-wing advocates, have troubling records and could cause serious damage to our rights and liberties," the groups said in press statement.

The report is expected to include criticism of the pro-life stance of Judge Pickering, who has been nominated to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Judge Pickering was chairman of the first national Republican platform committee that called for a constitutional amendment to ban abortion. "The Senate should reject far-right court-packing efforts, and should withhold its consent from right-wing nominees who do not demonstrate a commitment to civil rights and liberties," the groups said. "More moderate, mainstream nominees who reflect genuine bipartisan consultation should receive priority in processing."

The criticisms were dismissed by key Senate Republicans who said Judge Pickering had been approved by the American Bar Association.

"He's eminently qualified, supported by a broad group of individuals in our state, including minorities and women and plaintiff's attorneys and defense attorneys, and Republicans and Democrats. He's an outstanding individual," said Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican.

Judge Pickering was nominated in June, and one hearing was held late last year. Another hearing is expected in the coming weeks, and Republicans are pushing for a vote before the Presidents Day recess next month.

Democrats have stalled the vote by asking for additional information and notes, a tactic Mr. Lott describes as "a classic case of how the committee has kicked the can down the road."

"This is unnecessary and ridiculous harassment, and I believe that he will get a hearing and he will be confirmed," Mr. Lott said.

Mr. Bush nominated 64 judges last year, and 28 were confirmed. Yesterday, Mr. Bush nominated an additional 24 judges, bringing the total number now before the Senate to 60.

The groups also are opposing the nominations of Carolyn Kuhl, a California state trial court judge, to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals; Jeffrey Sutton to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals; and Priscilla Owen, a justice on the Texas Supreme Court, to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

The chief criticism of these nominees is that all are members of the Federalist Society for Law and Public Policy, a group of conservatives and libertarians.

According to the Federalist Web site (www.fed-soc.org), the group's mission "is founded on the principles that the state exists to preserve freedom, that the separation of governmental powers is central to our Constitution, and that it is emphatically the province and duty of the judiciary to say what the law is, not what it should be."

Sen. Larry E. Craig, Idaho Republican and chairman of the Republican Policy Committee, said Mr. Bush "will appoint exactly who he wants to appoint."

"That is the responsibility of the president; that is what happens when you win the presidency," Mr. Craig said.

Mr. Craig said the organizations had the right to speak out but cautioned them to stick to the facts.

"It's a tragic day in America when you can make political hay by failing to tell the truth," Mr. Craig said.

Since December, the liberal groups and other feminist organizations have been plotting a "nasty and contentious fight" against Mr. Bush's judicial nominees who do not support abortion, according to a memo of the groups' meeting obtained by The Washington Times.

The other organizations include the Ms. Foundation and the National Organization for Women.

Senators Protest Bush Judicial Pick; Murray, Cantwell Miffed at Selection Process, Say They Won't Back Leighton

By Charles Pope
The Seattle Post-Intelligencer
Thursday, January 24, 2002

President Bush yesterday nominated Tacoma attorney Ronald Leighton to be a federal district judge for Western Washington, ignoring strenuous objections by the state's two senators who complained they weren't adequately consulted.

Leighton was selected by an all-Republican selection committee formed with the White House's support by Rep. Jennifer Dunn, R-Wash. That angered Democratic Sens. Patty Murray and Maria Cantwell who said the nominee should be the product of a bipartisan panel. In a letter last month to White House counsel Alberto Gonzales, Murray and Cantwell said "we will not support any nominee for a Washington state federal bench vacancy who has not come through a bipartisan commission process."

That threat could stop Leighton in his tracks in the Senate, where a single objection is all that's required to derail a nomination. "I'm confident the Senate will not confirm a judicial nominee that does not have the support of the state's senators," Murray said.

"This is not about Mr. Leighton. He may well be a good, qualified candidate for judge. I'm sorry he got caught up in the White House's inability to understand that the Senate has a role in confirming judges," Murray said.

Murray added that the bipartisan system she used when Republican Slade Gorton served in the Senate would be a good model. That effort produced nominees that were supported by both parties and who enjoyed quick confirmation.

That is not likely to happen this time.

The nomination intensified a war of wills pitting Murray and Cantwell against Dunn and the White House. Murray insisted that the all-Republican committee broke a well-established practice of using a bipartisan panel to solicit potential nominees.

But Dunn said Cantwell and Murray weren't excluded and were given an opportunity to be "equal partners" in the process. Leighton was one of four candidates selected by Dunn's committee. Aides to Dunn said that a complete resume of each candidate was provided to Murray and Cantwell along with an offer to comment. Dunn said neither senator offered any comment.

Dunn praised the 50-year-old Leighton as a strong nominee whose ability and accomplishments shouldn't be overshadowed by a dispute over the process used to select him. "Sometimes senators make it sound like there is one system that has to be used," she said. "For the senators to use process as an excuse not to give the president his nominee is unfortunate."

If confirmed, Leighton would replace Judge Robert Bryan at the federal court in Tacoma. Bryan announced last year he would take "senior status," meaning he no longer would hear a full docket of cases.

A senior White House official, who spoke only on the condition he not be named, said the administration rejected a bipartisan commission because it would take too long. "There is a judicial vacancy crisis and the president wants to move rapidly," the official said. "This one has been vacant too long."

Murray disputed that claim, saying she, Cantwell and Dunn have been in discussions for a year in an effort to reach agreement on a method for picking judicial nominees.

The White House official added that Leighton is "superbly qualified" and urged that the Senate consider his qualifications rather than how he was selected. "We're confident he is of such high quality that no matter what the process, Ron Leighton would have been at the top of the list."

Brett,

We had more people on our current list to received BlackBerry's thans we had physical inventory (units). We installed 22 units in two and 1/2 days last week.

Procurement placed an additional order with the vendor on Friday, I expect to recieve the units and have them activated by Thursday this week.

How does Thursday or Friday this week look for you? What time would be good for you on either of those days? The tech will need an hour to complete the install and give you training. He will need your password, or someone there that has it several times during the install.
Thanks!

Subject: BlackBerry Wireless e-mail device.

You have been approved to receive a new EOP issued BlackBerry Wireless e-mail device. I am trying to schedule a time with you when a technician can take care of the installation of the unit at your desktop computer. The installation of a BlackBerry takes about 1 hour. The technician will be happy to review the BlackBerry configuration with you and answer any questions you may have.

The technician will need your password several times during the installation. If you do not plan on being available during the installation, please contact Lori Lorenzo so that she may be available to help the technician to log into your PC.

Please return this e-mail to me with a date and time that you would like the technician to perform your install and whether you will or will not be there at the time the technician performs the install. We will do our best to work into your schedule. The installers are normally available from 9:30 to 4:00.

Regards

Mack Bayne

Tim and Brett:

In Public Citizen v. Department of State, No 00-5387 (DC Cir. Jan 25, 2002), the DC Circuit held that the Department of State's policy in Freedom of Information Act request processing of treating the date of the FOIA request as the cut-off date for records responsive to the request was unreasonable. Passage of note is:

"At the very least, we think that with minimal administrative hassle, the Department could apply a date-of-search cut-off to the Central File. In short, like the CIA in McGehee, the State Department has failed to substantiate its claim that an 'administrative nightmare' would result were it unable to apply the date-of-request cut-off policy to Public Citizen's June request. In reaching this conclusion, we emphasize that nothing in this opinion precludes either the Department or any other federal agency from attempting a more compelling justification for imposing a date-of-request cut-off on a particular FOIA request." Brett,

We had more people on our current list to received BlackBerry's thans we had physical inventory (units). We installed 22 units in two and 1/2 days last week.

Procurement placed an additional order with the vendor on Friday, I expect to recieve the units and have them activated by Thursday this week.

How does Thursday or Friday this week look for you? What time would be good for you on either of those days? The tech will need an hour to complete the install and give you training. He will need your password, or someone there that has it several times during the install.
Thanks!

Brett-- the Teach for America press person wants to know if she can use WH photos and WH video in promotional material. Since they are a non-profit, is that a problem?

2. Will we have access to the photos? Will we have permission to use these after the event for future promotional opportunities? If so, to whom do we credit the photo?
3. If not, may we use our own photographer?

If so, may we get a copy of the tape after the event? Will we have permission to use excerpts from the tape as part of future promotional activities?

May we use excerpts from the speech in future promotional materials?

Moose,

This in from Randy.

In my opinion, it appears that Friedman could host a fund-raising reception with certain exceptions:

1. He'd have to hold the reception while not on duty. (Presumably, he'll host the party on a day when he's not here as a PFIAB member.)
2. He could send out the invitation but the invitation could not address the issue of fundraising. Something along the lines of "A party in honor of"
3. He could give a speech or some type of opening remarks, but again, he couldn't solicit political contributions. Another speaker who wasn't bound by Hatch Act would have to do that.
3. The invitation couldn't mention his membership on PFIAB.

I've got a call into OSC to double-check this, but that's my take.

3. He could give a speech or some type of opening remarks, but again, he couldn't solicit political contributions. Another speaker who wasn't bound by Hatch Act would have to do that.
3. The invitation couldn't mention his membership on PFIAB.

I've got a call into OSC to double-check this, but that's my take.

If for some reason it doesn't work we can still explore the option of Tim going down.

Can you have the coordinator of this event call me tomorrow so we can try to work this out? I need some info on airport, drive time/ground transpo, etc.

Ex-Agriculture Secretary Espy indicted on 39 countsBy Stephen Labaton WASHINGTON -- Mike Espy, President Clinton's first agriculture secretary, was indicted Wednesday by a federal grand jury that said he, his brother and his girlfriend received more than $35,000 in favors from large companies with important interests before the government. Espy then tried to cover up some of the gifts, the indictment said. Espy, a Mississippi politician who was appointed to a senior position in the administration after lending crucial support to Bill Clinton's first presidential campaign, is the first current or former member of Clinton's Cabinet to be charged with a crime. He was indicted on 39 felony charges that include committing mail and wire fraud, violating the Meat Inspection Act of 1907, taking illegal gratuities, making false statements and tampering with a witness. Prosecutors say Espy broke the law by accepting tickets to professional basketball, football and tennis events as well as other gifts. The gifts included a Waterford crystal bowl, luggage, lavish cross-country trips, cash payments to his girlfriend and a $10,000 contribution to his brother Henry's unsuccessful campaign for Congress. Espy then failed to report the gifts properly and misled federal investigators and Clinton's chief of staff about them, prosecutors said. They said Espy also asked an Agriculture Department official to alter a document requested by the inspector general about a lobbyist who paid for Espy's and his girlfriend's trip to a National Football League playoff game in Dallas in 1994. Espy's girlfriend, Patricia Dempsey, was named in the indictment but has not been charged. She is said to be talking to investigators in exchange for immunity from prosecution. Henry Espy, also named in the indictment, was acquitted in March on unrelated charges that he lied to a bank to obtain a loan to help repay a campaign debt for his unsuccessful effort to fill the House seat vacated by his brother in 1993. The indictment portrayed Espy as an official who regularly accepted big and small favors from executives of companies regulated by his department. He asked the chairman of Quaker Oats Co., for example, for two tickets worth $90 to a championship game in 1993 between the Chicago Bulls and the Phoenix Suns. On another occasion, the indictment said, Espy scheduled official events around a weekend in Atlanta in January 1994 so he could attend the Super Bowl at a cost of $2,200 to a company with issues under consideration by the Agriculture Department. In another case, he improperly kept a car leased to the department near his Mississippi home to use for personal travel. When questions arose about the gifts, the indictment said, Espy either lied to investigators or quickly made restitution and called the matter an oversight. For example, when confronted about his decision to use a corporate jet to fly home after a weekend retreat in Arkansas in 1993 sponsored by Tyson Foods, Espy told investigators he was directed to return to the White House early for dinner with Clinton and that no commercial flights were available. In fact, the indictment said, Espy had planned all along to use the corporate jet even though his staff already had made reservations for him with a commercial airline. White House officials declined comment on the indictment, as did Espy. Indictment criticized As the investigation was expanding near the end of 1994, Espy stepped down as agriculture secretary and returned to practice law in Jackson, Miss., at the firm of Crosthwait Terney. A receptionist at the firm said Wednesday that Espy would not make any statements and referred calls to his lawyer in Washington, Reid Weingarten. Weingarten issued a statement denouncing the indictment without addressing the particulars. Never has so much been made of so little," Weingarten said. In an effort to justify three years and countless millions spent on this investigation, the special prosecutor has stretched criminal statutes beyond recognition and taken trivial, personal and entirely benign activities and attempted to distort them into criminal acts. These efforts will ultimately prove unavailing, and we look forward to going to court and restoring Mike Espy's good name." The indictment did not accuse Espy's Agriculture Department of granting any favors to the companies or changing any policies as a consequence of the gifts. At a news conference Wednesday, t he leading user of corporate jets. For the last several years, according to his aides, he has traveled on corporate jets on virtually every trip between Washington, D.C., and his home state of Kansas -- a luxury that he learned to enjoy during his unsuccessful 1988 presidential campaign. As a ranking member of the Senate Agriculture Committee, Dole relies heavily on jets provided by big agribusiness firms such as ConAgra, Archer Daniels Midland and U.S. Tobacco Co. All are reimbursed according to federal guidelines. Likewise, Gephardt reported using corporate jets 25 times in the last two years. Dole and Gephardt are by no means the only members of Congress who like corporate jets. In fact, according to congressional sources, the chief reason that Sununu's flights have received so little criticism on Capitol Hill is that most members of Congress themselves enjoy using corporate aircraft for their own transportation. Although federal law expressly forbids Administration officials or members of Congress from soliciting or accepting plane flights or "anything of value" from corporations whose interests they oversee, most officials have found ways to circumvent these laws, too. White House officials contend that even though Sununu flew on planes owned by federal contractors and personally solicited one of those flights, he did not violate the law because the chief of staff has no direct responsibility over the contracts of these firms. For members of Congress it is even easier to skirt the law by soliciting corporate plane flights through their campaign committees. While it is technically illegal for them to solicit such flights in their role as members of Congress, legal experts say, it is perfectly legal for political campaign committees to solicit any contribution, including a plane flight. Legal or not, politicians seem to prefer to keep their use of corporate jets as secret as possible -- especially since Sununu has come under fire. Not all such flights are subject to public disclosure, and some of those involved flatly refuse to talk about it. When asked to disclose the details of the trip that Democratic congressmen took to New York last month aboard three corporate aircraft, Laura Nichols, spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, replied sharply: "I could, but I'm not going to." Likewise, Mary Robbins, a spokesman for ConAgra, declined to discuss her company's policy for flying politicians around the country. "We operate our planes in compliance with the law; we have nothing to say on that subject," she said. Despite the secrecy, the names of the companies willing to provide politicians with corporate jets are widely known in political circles. The Democratic and Republican parties are said to keep lists of available aircraft. As Nichols of the Democratic campaign committee puts it: "We know where to go if we need to procure a plane." As a result, demand for the planes often exceeds supply and some corporate executives say that requests from politicians seeking to use their aircraft are becoming far too frequent. "A lot of CEOs would be very happy if Congress changed the law and said you couldn't do it," said one company official, who declined to be identified. Yet some companies do it gladly. The late John Amos, founder of American Family Life Assurance, made his plane available to politicians primarily because he enjoyed their company and their friendship, according to Kathleen Spencer, a corporate spokeswoman. Thus it was a fitting tribute to Amos that when he died last year, Sens. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) and Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) and other politicians flew to Georgia aboard the corporate jet to serve as pallbearers at his funeral.

The Associated Press, 06/27/91: Sununu's Hardly Alone When it Comes to Corporate Jetting By JOHN KING

Tennessee Rep. Don Sundquist and Commerce Secretary Robert Mosbacher hopped aboard a corporate jet last June and headed to Nashville for a dinner honoring the Republican congressman. Sundquist paid Philip Morris $547 for the flight - the cost of a first-class ticket aboard a commercial carrier but far below what it would cost to charter a jet for the trip. In taking the convenient flight, Sundquist and Mosbacher - far and away the executive branch's most frequent corporate flier - were taking advantage

e of one of Washington's best perks: no-hassle access to corporate aircraft at the same cost of a commercial flight. The Republican National Committee pays for many of Mosbacher's political trips, although its Federal Election Commission reports show no payment to Philip Morris for the trip with Sundquist. The RNC sometimes accepts corporate flights as in-kind contributions to its non-federal accounts, but a spokesman could not immediately say if the Mosbacher flight to the Sundquist event was treated that way. Such travel has gained scrutiny of late because of White House chief of staff John Sununu's use of corporate jets for political trips - after his travel on government planes was sharply restricted by President Bush. Sununu is hardly alone when it comes to calling on big business for travel help. Campaign finance reports and government travel records show frequent use of corporate jets by members of Congress and certain members of the Cabinet. In Congress, House Majority Leader Richard Gephardt, D-Mo., and Senate Republican Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., appear to lead the list, but dozens of others took at least one corporate flight last year. The lawmakers and senior administration officials defend such flights on grounds they are fully disclosed and paid for with political funds, and allow them to make more effective use of their time. Critics point to the obvious about such cozy travel arrangements - that public officials who fly on corporate jets make themselves captive audiences for the executives and lobbyists who routinely ride along. "I think there is potential conflict of interest, and it's access that the average person doesn't have," said Craig McDonald of Congress Watch, a citizens' group that monitors Congress. "It's a special favor - another gift and perk that government officials are receiving." Gephardt used a jet provided by G.C. Services in August of last year for a five-city, two-day fund-raising and campaign trip, one of two dozen trips he made on corporate planes in 1989 and 1990, according to his campaign reports and office records. Gephardt's political action committee paid the company $3,320 for use of the plane, but not until five weeks after the trip. Gephardt's office is researching why this and several other payments to corporations were made after the trips, and said in most cases it appears Gephardt's staff believed the campaign he was supporting would pay for the jet. Such payments are by law supposed to be made in advance to prevent corporations from making what amounts to an illegal corporate donation to a federal campaign. "In the overwhelming majority of cases the payments were made on time," said Gephardt spokeswoman Deborah Johns. She said Gephardt uses corporate flights for roughly 30 percent of his travel, most of it on behalf of Democratic colleagues and candidates. "We check to see if commercial flights can accommodate the schedule first," Johns said. Like consumers loyal to a favorite airline, politicians often fly on planes owned by companies with a history of supporting their campaigns and causes. Campaign reports show that Gephardt, D-Mo., and Dole, R-Kan., flew separately last year on jets provided by Archer Daniels Midland, Federal Express and U.S. Tobacco Corp. All three companies have been big supporters of the lawmakers in the past five years. Archer Daniels Midland has donated $51,000 to Dole and his political action committee, Campaign America, since 1985, and $11,000 to Gephardt and his PAC, the Effective Government Committee. The Federal Express PAC has given $34,000 to Dole and Campaign America since 1985; $27,500 to Gephardt and his PAC. U.S. Tobacco donated $34,000 to Dole, $17,500 to Gephardt. Mosbacher's travel records show he often travels on corporate jets several days a week, often tapping former business associates and big GOP donors for use of their jets. Six months after he took office, Mosbacher traveled to Milwaukee for a June 1989 fund-raiser for Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson. Commercial airlines offer more than a half-dozen non-stop flights daily from Washington, but Mosbacher flew on a jet provided by Windway Capital Corp. The company is owned by Terry J. Kohler, now a Thompson nominee for the board of regents at the University of Wisconsin. Kohler and his family and associates are big donors to political campaigns. Mosbacher also flew on a corporate jet last year for a six-day European trip. The plane was provided by Saul Steinberg, a major donor to Bush's 1988 presidential campaign. Others who have supplied jets for Mosbacher's travels include communications companies Northern Telecom and Ameritec

h, along with PepsiCo., Philip Morris, Atlantic Richfield and Enron Corp., on whose board Mosbacher served, plus a handful of universities.

Sununu Personally Apologized For Travel Flap, Bush Says By John

E. Yang White House Chief of Staff John H. Sununu has apologized to President Bush for any embarrassment he might have caused the president with the controversy over his use of government planes and automobiles, Bush said today. During a news conference, Bush also gave Sununu his backing and said he wanted to put the issue to rest. "He told me right from the heart that he regretted very much any controversy and anything that this may have done to diminish the ethical standards of this presidency," Bush said as Sununu looked on, nodding in agreement. "He came in and we had a good heart-to-heart talk -- more than one -- about it," Bush continued. "I think John said, 'If mistakes were made, I made them.' What more can a man be asked to say? . . . And I told him, 'Look, I understand this.' . . . He's done the right things in terms of expressing his own personal feelings to me and to our staff and to others." The disclosure in May of Sununu's extensive use of military aircraft for official, personal and political travel led Bush to tighten restrictions on his chief of staff's authority to travel by those means. More criticism followed last month, when Sununu used a government car to attend a stamp auction in New York, and solicited the use of a privately owned corporate jet to fly to a political function in Chicago. The president said he had "full confidence in [Sununu] as we work some very complicated issues through the Congress. I respect him. I value his advice and counsel." Bush seemed impatient with the subject. "Very candidly, no laws having been violated, I think we ought to move on to something more important," he said. "I'd like to see this matter laid to rest."

The New York Times , 06/28/91:

alls Top U.S. Jews To Dispel 'Misperceptions' By ROBERT PEAR, Special to The New York Times John H. Sununu said today that he was "not blaming anybody but myself" for the uproar over his travel, and he called leaders of major American Jewish groups in an effort to dispel "misperceptions" that he held them responsible for some of his troubles. Earlier today President Bush's spokesman, Marlin Fitzwater, said the suggestion that Mr. Sununu, a Lebanese American, had blamed pro-Israel groups for his problems was not "a real issue." Mr. Fitzwater said that news articles including such suggestions had "no attribution," and he described the whole issue as an "insidious and difficult thing." Mr. Sununu, the White House chief of staff, has been widely criticized, by Administration officials and members of Congress, for his extensive use of military jets, Government limousines and corporate aircraft for personal and political trips. Conference Call to Officials In a one-sentence statement issued today by the White House, Mr. Sununu said: "As I told the White House senior staff yesterday, I am not blaming anybody but myself for the flurry of recent events, nor am I engaging at all, in what would be a very non-constructive effort, to suggest any involvement by anyone or any groups in what has taken place or been reported." The columnists Rowland Evans and Robert Novak and other writers have reported in recent days that Mr. Sununu suspects that attacks on him are motivated by his background as a Lebanese-American and, as the columnists put it, by positions that are "not fully supportive of Israel's demands on the United States." Abraham H. Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, said the suggestion that American Jews had been working for Mr. Sununu's ouster was "pure nonsense and mischief-making of the most dangerous kind." Mr. Sununu placed a conference call to Jewish leaders today to assure them that he was not blaming them for his difficulties. Among those on the call were Mr. Foxman; David Harris

, executive vice president of the American Jewish Committee; Malcolm I. Hoenlein, executive director of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations; George Klein, co-chairman of the Republican Jewish Coalition, and Mayer Mitchell, president of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee. In identical letters sent today to Mr. Foxman and Mr. Hoenlein, Mr. Sununu said that he wanted to preserve "a good and productive working relationship" with American Jewish groups. "We have disagreed on substance from time to time, and I have found those debates to be helpful and informative," said Mr. Sununu, who, like Mr. Bush, has often expressed concern about the expansion of Israeli settlements in the occupied West Bank. In the letters, Mr. Sununu said: "I value my relationship with the Jewish community and intend to continue working with all of you in an accessible and forthright manner. I know you share my concerns with the misperceptions of the past week, and I appreciate the willingness of you and your colleagues to work together with me to put this issue to rest."

The Boston

Officials too tempted by travel, groups say By Stephen Kur kjian, Globe Staff Commerce Secretary Robert A. Mosbacher, whose agency oversees trade policy on food brought into this country, used a plane owned by the nation's largest fruit importer to go to Cincinnati last March for an international trade conference. A change in ethics rules allowed Mosbacher to fly as a guest of corporations four times that month, which was when the new policy took effect. While recent public attention has focused on the White House chief of staff, John H. Sununu, other top federal officials also are making frequent use of corporate jets. The new administration policy is simply an expansion of one that has allowed similar travel by congressmen for years. The broadened policy, however, spotlighted by the recent reports surrounding Sununu, is prompting growing concern that it increases the potential for conflicts of interest between policy-makers and the corporations they help regulate. "It is inappropriate for public officials to travel at the expense of private interests, and particularly private interests that have business before those officials," said David Eppler, an attorney for Public Citizen, a consumer group headed by Ralph Nader. "As outrageous as it is for members of Congress and the administration to take frivolous trips at taxpayers' expense, it is even more outrageous to allow lobbyists and corporations to legally bribe them with privately funded travel," Eppler said. Congressmen have always been able to solicit trips on corporate jets from lobbyists and businesses. And, in 1989, Congress went along with a request by the Bush administration - to ensure passage of a pay raise for the lawmakers, some political reformers say - and extended the policy allowing travel on private planes to high officials inside the administration. That change took effect in March. In the first month alone, records show, there were about 100 trips by federal officials aboard corporate planes or reimbursed by businesses or private groups. The practice has drawn the ire of several public interest groups and a handful of congressmen. Many agencies, like the Commerce Department, complain that their travel budgets are limited and their top-level management would be unable to attend conferences, seminars and speeches, which together expand their expertise, were it not for the largesse of corporate America. A spokesman said that Commerce Department lawyers make certain that Mosbacher does not accept trips from any corporations that have cases or special requests pending before the department, and that he never discusses a corporation's particular concerns if he is on a plane that the firm owns. However, one of the other trips that Mosbacher took in March was aboard a corporate jet provided by Transco Energy Co., a natural gas pipeline firm based in Houston with many interests overseen by the Commerce Department. Lobbyists and corporate executives, who have lent their aircraft over the years to members of Congress, have said in recent interviews that they rarely tried to bring up business concerns when a lawmaker or administration official is on board. "It is considered crude and off-limits to talk about business if you're giving a member of Congress a ride somewhere," said John C. White, who represents Coastal Corp., a Houston oil and gas company that frequently makes its planes available to shuttle congressmen. "But it does build up a reservoir of good will with them that can come in handy someday, maybe to open a door for someone, maybe to listen to another line of reasoning. It doesn't buy anyone any votes, but in the end it can be helpful," White said. While serious business may not be transacted on such trips, some administrative agencies remain wary about the change in the ethics policy and still refuse to allow their employees to accept corporate trips. Spokesmen for both the departments of Agriculture and Housing and Urban Development said their managers are still prohibited from soliciting or accepting corporate trips. "There's just too many possible conflicts of interest. Flying commercially is inconvenient for everyone, but not enough to make it prohibitive," a HUD official recently told reporters. Rep. Robert Wise, a Virginia Democrat who strongly has criticized Sununu for frequent use of military jets, said administration officials should not be allowed to solicit or accept travel paid for or provided by private corporations. A Cabinet member or White House official "just has too much influence on presidential or other important decisions to have put in the path of temptation," Wise said. Why then should the prohibition not extend to congressmen? "I know that seems logical, but the decisions that an individual congressman makes have so much less influence on whether a bill gets passed or not that I don't believe the risk is there to put him on a plane with a lobbyist," Wise said. "Anyway, if a congressman does something wrong, the public has a chance to replace him every two years." Top congressional leaders, particularly the Senate minority leader, Bob Dole of Kansas, and the House majority leader, Richard A. Gephardt of Missouri, make frequent use of corporate jets to shuttle them back to their states and to political events across the country. Records on file at the Federal Election Commission show that Gephardt flew corporate planes 25 times in 1989 and 1990 to various fund-raising and campaign appearances. Dole, meanwhile, has flown corporate or charter jets back to Kansas and elsewhere dozens of times in the past three years. Although a spokesman said Dole is rarely questioned by constituents about the use of the corporate planes, his 1988 presidential campaign did suffer politically when it was disclosed that he used corporate jets as his primary means of travel. Former Gov. Dukakis also drew criticism for using planes provided by the O'Connell Management Corp., a Quincy development firm, and the Thomas H. Lee Co., owned by a Lincoln businessman, for political flights during the 1988 campaign. Federal campaign laws allow candidates for Congress and president to solicit and accept flights aboard corporate jets as long as they pay first-class commercial fares or charter rates to the corporations. However, many public interest groups criticize the practice, since the payments are usually a fraction of the actual cost of the chartered flights. "It's a neat way of allowing corporations to skirt the prohibition against contributing to campaigns" and ought to be stopped, said Fred Wertheimer, president of Common Cause, which has sought to reform federal ethics and campaign laws. Despite that criticism, congressmen continue to line up for corporate jets to avoid the hassle of commercial flights. Despite the distressed economy, numerous corporations remain willing to make their jets available. The four Republican and Democratic campaign committees that provide funding and other resources to candidates for the House and Senate all maintain lists of corporations or private businessmen who are willing to provide planes, often at a moment's notice. Federal Express is often sought out by candidates for both parties, so much so that one former Democratic operative said, "If they offered frequent-flyer mileage, we would have been able to fly around the world 10 times over."

PRIVATEThe Christian

Science Monitor, 06/25/91: Bush Aide's Travel Arrangements Raise Questions of Impropriety

By Marshall Ingwerson, Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Sununu is being criticized for using government cars and planes for frequent personal trips and for soliciting a private corporate jet PRESIDENT Bush's to

p staff aide, John Sununu, stands accused of arrogance, royalism, insensitivity, poor political judgment, and creating the appearance of impropriety in how he chooses his transportation. The travel modes of White House staff members are not matters of great moment, yet for Mr. Sununu the issue has snowballed to the point of dominating news out of the White House and possibly imperiling his effectiveness - if not his job. Governor Sununu, as the chief of staff is called, is for many an inviting target for criticism in an administration otherwise unstained by scandal. He is especially forceful and abrasive in a job that often requires a take-no-prisoners toughness. His heavy hand helps free the president to be kinder and gentler. Yet Sununu is clearly more than a target of opportunity. His travel arrangements would have most federal bureaucrats facing serious sanctions. The ethical standards of Sununu's travel fall somewhere between the strict requirements for employees of the executive branch and the virtual carte blanche given the president himself to fly at public expense wherever he goes. The complaints against the chief of staff began with his extensive personal and political travel by military aircraft. They were aggravated by a long personal trip using his government car and driver and by his soliciting rides on corporate jets. Last week, in addition, the White House counsel found Sununu or his aides to have misinformed them about who paid for a jet he used. Sununu's travel arrangements have been restricted in ever-tighter increments in recent weeks on the orders of the president. As he has compounded his controversy with new travel, his defenders in Republican circles and the administration have fallen away. They instead have expressed growing frustration at his judgment. This weekend, he made his own first apology and acknowledged his "mistakes." The president himself acknowledged "the appearance of impropriety" last week but continues to indicate that Sununu's job is safe. The travel in question raises two different ethical questions. One concerns the use of military planes and a government car for personal and Republican Party business. The other is the potential for conflict of interest in soliciting jet-rides from corporations with particular business before the government. Sununu is one of two White House staff members allowed to travel in military planes in order to keep in constant, secure communication with the White House. He is one of five staff members given "portal-to-portal authority" - meaning he gets door-to-door service in a government-owned Chrysler sedan with a driver and a telephone. When Sununu takes a military plane to Boston for a dental appointment, for example, he is required to pay a rate comparable to commercial air fares - although these are a small fraction of the actual cost of the trip to the government. Sununu's many such trips "are not a violation of law, just a misappropriation of government property," says G. Calvin MacKenzie, a professor at Colby College who studies the executive branch staff and consults federal agencies on ethical matters. When Mr. Sununu took his government car from Washington to a New York stamp auction early this month, he worked throughout the trip, he says. Since the trip was personal, he is required to pay taxes on the car based on its lease value, the mileage, and the driver's salary. Dr. MacKenzie compares Sununu's arrangements with the recent case of another federal government employee. After using a government car on business all day out of town, he took his collegiate son out to dinner, then dropped him off back at his dormitory. He was reported for using government equipment for nonbusiness and was suspended six weeks without pay. Another comparison is the president himself, for whom the taxpayers foot the bill without complaint for helicopter trips to Camp David each weekend and plane trips to his family retreat at Kennebunkport. The presidency is understood to be a 24-hour responsibility of immense proportions. The public pays for all his travel for the sake of his efficiency and readiness. Extending that privilege to the chief of staff is a decision that rests ultimately with President Bush. The rules for private jets prohibited accepting rides from peoples or companies with direct regulatory or other business before the government. Whether the plane providers seek or get any influence, the gift of the ride creates the appearance of a conflict of interest. Sununu's latest flight in a private jet, to a Republican fund-raising dinner in the Midwest, was solicited from a Washington businessman who lease d the plane from major contractors in the area. Sununu's request for clearance of the arrangement by the White House counsel listed only the owners and misidentified them. "The standards of ethics in the White House are, and in my opinion have to be, higher than anywhere else in the country," says Bradley Patterson, who served on the Eisenhower, Nixon, and Ford staffs. "The appearance of impropriety is, ipso facto, impropriety."

Editorial:

A High Flier Returns to Earth WITH HIS FEET firmly on the ground at last, John Sununu has a chance to receive daily lessons in humility. Now that he is no longer able to commandeer planes or even limousines, Sununu can pick up the morning paper and read about his possible successors as President Bush's chief of staff. Several names are mentioned with some frequency, and some appear to be top flight. Kenneth Duberstein did an excellent job in the post in the last part of the Reagan administration, and Craig Fuller served as Bush's vice presidential chief of staff. Sununu managed to fritter away his immense power, becoming an embarrassing figure when he took a series of trips in military and corporate jets and when he grabbed a White House limousine so he could buy some rare stamps in New York. WHEN HE FOUND himself in trouble, he discovered that the high government officials he had snubbed were unwilling to come to his defense. President Bush has been his one notable defender -- and sometimes the president sounds a bit like a Major League owner who gives his manager a full vote of confidence right up to the moment he fires him. On balance, the criticism over Sununu's travels should have positive results. Whether Sununu remains in the White House or not, his power will be diminished. Other government officials will then have far greater opportunities to carry their views to the president.

Travel Perks Are Widespread in Capital By MIC

HAEL WINES with MARTIN TOLCHIN, Special to The New York Times The travel habits of President Bush's chief of staff, John H. Sununu, have spawned renewed criticism of the travel perquisites of high Federal officials, especially the extent to which private organizations finance the trips of policy makers. Reports filed with the Office of Government Ethics show that during March alone, companies and organizations outside the Government paid for at least 85 trips by employees of the White House and other executive branch agencies. That total is almost certainly understated because only four of the 13 Cabinet-level agencies have filed the quarterly reports, which were required under Federal rules issued March 8. In Congress, newly filed financial disclosure statements show that 61 Senators and scores of House members accepted free trips from outside groups in 1990, beyond the extensive travel given them to attend speaking engagements. Federal Election Commission reports also indicate that lawmakers frequently shuttle between Washington and their home states on corporate jets and charters, for weekend visits and re-election barnstorming. The travels of Mr. Sununu and others were all made under a welter of Federal laws and rules that frown on most subsidized travel, but nevertheless permit it under conditions that vary with one's job and rank. The rules are starkly different for Congressional and executive officials, as well as for official and personal business. For example, official Government travel can be privately financed under a 1989 law, the regulations for which were issued in March. But Mr. Sununu's personal and political travels, by military and corporate jet, are effectively unregulated except by the internal White House guidelines that were revised on Friday for the second time in a month. Like the travels of Mr. Sununu, the journeys of other executive-branch officials and legislators appear to be legal. Indeed, many are for clear public purposes, from attendance at scientific seminars to soliciting the views of citizens outside Washington. Offending the Public The White House also says that security and time pressure require Mr. Sununu and other aides to travel in most cases by charter or Government plane rather than by scheduled airlines. But some legislators and watchdog groups argue that free travel, like any private subsidy of public officials, is by itself an invitation to abuse of privilege and of public faith in government. They say the impression is unavoidable that a public official who benefits from private largesse will be inclined to favor his benefactor in any proceedings. They also maintain that the granting of such private favors, however well intentioned, fosters the image of a privileged class of rulers that is offensive to most Americans. Mr. Sununu, some of them say, is a case in point. "The most important thing about ethics is to start with the premise that simply because it's legal doesn't make it proper," said Michael Josephson, an ethics scholar in Los Angeles. "The point that Sununu has the discretion to use a vehicle doesn't address the question of whether he's properly using it." The Washington lobbying group Common Cause, which has frequently sought to restrict the influence of private money on public officials, said this week that corporate and other outside financing of Government travel should be banned outright. "We should go back to a system where executive branch officials traveling on official business have their expenses paid by the Government, and we do not have private interest groups financing the public activities of public officials," said Fred M. Wertheimer, president of the group. Representative Anthony C. Beilenson, Democrat of California, said, "By and large, all trips abroad are worthwhile." He continued: "But I myself am comfortable only when our own Government is paying. There's always a potential conflict of interest when a private group finances the trip." Mr. Sununu's defenders, as well as many legislators, assert that top officials fly chartered military or private jets for good reason: their packed schedules are at odds with commercial flights, for example, or they need the instant communications and physical security that a private jet provides. But Federal rules also have made the charters available to Government officials at a price that no ordinary citizen could hope to obtain. Federal election regulations allow elected officials to rent corporate and other jets for the price of a first-class commercial airline fare for most trips. The White House has adopted a broadly similar rule for the reimbursements that its employees must pay for using military aircraft. Private and military jets can cost hundreds or thousands of dollars an hour to operate; the remainder is often absorbed by the private plane owners or the military. A Thicket of Laws Private financing of travel for official Government business is controlled by a thicket of Federal laws, regulations and Congressional rules. The regulations issued in March by the General Services Administration authorize the executive branch to permit private sponsorship of Government travel by both employees and their spouses, even when the sponsor has "interests that may be substantially affected" by the traveling employee's actions. The yardstick, the rule states, is whether the Federal agency's interest in the employee's travel "outweighs concern that acceptance of the payment may or may reasonably appear to influence improperly the employee in the performance of his or her official duties." The decision is made by the ethics officer in each agency. Executive Order 12371, issued in October 1990, bars Federal employees from accepting favors from outsiders whose interests they can affect, "except pursuant to such reasonable exceptions as are provided by regulation." It also directs employees "to avoid any actions creating the appearance" that they are violating the law or the ethical standards of the order. House and Senate rules prohibit a private source from paying a lawmaker's travel expenses for more than seven days of international travel and three or four days of local travel. One person is allowed to accompany a legislator. But the rules allow paid travel on "fact-finding" missions related to a lawmaker's duties. And they allow privately financed trips to personal events, like celebrity golf tournaments. On the other hand, private financing of personal and political travel by Executive Branch employees is all but unregulated, except by laws that prohibit bribery and limit acceptance of gifts from outsiders with interests in Government actions. Paying for 'Fact-Finding' Privately fi nanced trips by members of Congress included a January 1990 tour of Bangkok and Australia by a Tennessee Republican, Representative Don Sundquist, and his wife. The visit was largely paid for by the Australian Meat and Livestock Corporation and a group called American Business in Thailand. In May 1990, he and his wife traveled to Ireland on a "fact-finding" mission courtesy of the Schering-Plough Corporation, a pharmaceuticals company. Mr. Sundquist serves on the Ways and Means committee, which handles trade issues. His press aide, Ralph Perrey, said all the trips included meetings "with government officials and representatives of American companies which had an interest in doing business abroad." Senator Jeff Bingaman, Democrat of New Mexico, flew to Japan last November at the expense of the Shimoda Conference, sponsored by the Japan Society of America and the Japan Center for International Exchange. "It was a topflight group from the United States and Japan," said Mr. Bingaman, chairman of the Armed Services Subcommittee on Defense Industry and Technology. "We had very substantive discussions on the major issues that divide the two countries."

AN APOLOGY IS DUE THE CHIEF OF STAFF
SUNUNU WORKS HARDER THAN ANY CO

RPORATE EXECUTIVE AND DESERVES HIS TRAVEL PERKS. By ORRIN G. HATCH, Sen. Orrin

Hatch of Utah is the ranking Republican member of the Labor and Human Resources Committee. The vitriolic attacks on White House chief of staff John Sununu should not surprise veteran Washington watchers. With President Bush riding a wave of popularity after the Persian Gulf victory, the Administration's critics turned to one of the capital's favorite political blood sports: attack through a proxy target. Unfortunately for him and his family, Sununu has become the lightning rod, under siege not because of what he has done but because of who he works for. As a democratic society, Americans sometimes derive furtive pleasure from seeing the mighty humbled. While few have spoken out against the barrage of media criticism -- including some of the most scathing political cartoons in memory -- partisan critics have engaged in excessive verbal attacks. We need to put the issue of Sununu's travel in perspective. The tip-off that the issue is not advancing ethics but wounding the Administration lies in the recurring nature of the controversy. After Sununu weathered the first attacks, concerning his trips aboard military aircraft, his adversaries lined up another barrage on his use of a government car to travel to New York, then on accepting flights aboard corporate aircraft. Never mind that no laws or even ethical guidelines were broken or that he conducted business on his car phone during most of the trip to New York -- or that many lower-ranking civilian and military officials quite properly have aircraft available for government-related travel. His adversaries were determined, in the Washington tradition, to create an "appearance of impropriety" and force him from office. The real issue, however, is not whether he should accept corporate rides, but why he was ever deprived of military flights. The future of the United States turns on the decisions made by its top political leaders. The demands on their schedules and attention dwarf those of their counterparts in the business world. Their jobs often push them to the brink of physical and mental exhaustion. If we want our leaders to make the right decisions, we should not quibble about providing facilities, such as aircraft for official business, that help them perform their almost impossible tasks while keeping them healthy, rested and family-oriented. Since their actions affect not billions but trillions of dollars of public spending, that is not too high a price to pay. Today's controversy centers not on some petty apparatchik but on a man who holds a critically important office. He orchestrates the President's schedule, weighs in on all important issues, participates in almost every top-level meeting, administers the large staffs of the White House and the Executive Office of the President, travels frequently with the President, represents the Administration at scores of events, rides herd on the vast Washington bureaucracy to advance the President's goals and carries on countless telephone calls with th the ever-demanding 535 members of Congress who seek his attention. John Sununu spends more time after hours serving the President than most executives spend on the job all day. He has set a standard that will represent a heavy cross to carry for all future chiefs of staff. Yet fulfilling these official responsibilities would deprive anyone of the time needed for family and good health. Virtually all chief executives of Fortune 500 companies have corporate jets at their disposal to economize on travel time. They -- and their stockholders -- know that such conveniences are not pampered privileges but sound business sense. They can make the difference between winning or losing multimillion-dollar deals and sales, between making the right and wrong decisions. We as a nation have an even greater stake in ensuring that balanced and considered judgments determine our great national decisions. Moreover, the critics overlook the fact that Air Force pilots and aircraft must log at least 20 hours of flight time per month, whether or not they have official passengers to transport. In addition, Air Force jets often must be moved around the country as part of the routine deployment schedules of the U.S. Military Airlift Command. Would the country really be better off if these jets flew empty rather than enabling officials such as Sununu to meet the demands of their jobs? I can confirm that the rumors of John Sununu's assertive personality match the reality. Nevertheless, I like and admire him and respect his profound capabilities. The attacks on his character are utterly fallacious. He is a man of great integrity, dedicated to public service and inspired by high-minded idealism. His critics have had their fun and games, but it is now time to stop subjecting him and his family to such gratuitous and baseless personal attacks.

TOP BUSH AIDES REPORTED

LY ANGRY OVER SUNUNU FLAP

WHITE HOUSE: GRAY SAID TO BE 'IRRITATED' OVER CHIEF OF STAFF'S ERRONEOUS TRAVEL DATA. QUAYLE, MOSBACHER UPSET BY ADDED SCRUTINY, SOURCES SAY.

By JAMES GERSTENZANG and SARA FRITZ, TIMES STAFF WRITERS Top Bush Administration officials, including Vice President Dan Quayle, White House Counsel C. Boyden Gray and Commerce Secretary Robert A. Mosbacher, have become increasingly embittered by Chief of Staff John H. Sununu's controversial travel habits, sources said Friday. Gray, who serves as President Bush's attorney, was described by White House insiders as being "annoyed and irritated" with the White House chief of staff after his office provided erroneous information about one of Sununu's flights aboard a corporate airplane. Others, including Quayle and Mosbacher, have faced embarrassment as their own travel is subjected to increased scrutiny as a result of Sununu's use of Air Force jets, government automobiles and corporate aircraft. "It never would have come about if it weren't for Sununu," said one White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity. At a White House meeting Thursday evening, he said, "frustration was being vented by everyone over the whole thing." "The essential problem," said a senior White House aide, is that "Sununu's created a lot of trouble for people." The anger, which is emanating from the White House as well as several Cabinet departments, illustrates the most immediate impact of the travel flap: Although Sununu's immediate tenure does not appear at risk, barring new developments, the affair has undermined the harmonious functioning of a White House that prides itself on avoiding the backbiting that prevailed in the Ronald Reagan Administration. The risk, said one Republican with ties to the Administration, "is a White House that won't be able to function very well, with people looking over their shoulders all the time." Within the White House, he said, those in Sununu's office have for the most part "isolated themselves so they're in one camp, and everybody else is in the other." Even within Sununu's office, one White House official said, there is dissension. The chief of staff's deputy, Andrew J. Card, has maintained good relations with others in the White House, the official said, but "eve

he independent counsel in the case, Donald Smaltz, said the laws Espy was charged with breaking did not require such a finding. We do not charge a quid pro quo," Smaltz said. We don't have to under the gratuity statute. A quid pro quo is not required." Sources of gifts Most of the gifts are said to have come from two of the nation's largest agricultural interests, which also have been the focus of the investigation: Sun Diamond Growers of California and Tyson Foods of Springdale, Ark. Last year, Sun Diamond was convicted of illegally giving more than $9,000 worth of gifts to Espy and was fined $1.5 million. It is a large cooperative whose 4,500 members produce raisins, walnuts, prunes, figs, hazelnuts and other foods. Tyson, the world's largest poultry producer, was notified this year that it was a target of the investigation and that it could soon be indicted. Ed Nicholson, a Tyson spokesman, called the allegations flimsy." The secretary was never asked by Tyson for any special treatment and none was ever offered or received," Nicholson said. We deplore the independent counsel's apparent view that acts of common hospitality -- consisting of a couple of meals and a football game -- can rise to the level of criminal conduct in the absence of any attempt by our company to exploit its nonexistent special relationship with Mr. Espy." Tyson's former top executive, Don Tyson, has been talking to investigators in exchange for immunity, two people involved in the investigation said Wednesday, and he might be called to testify at Espy's trial. If found guilty on all 39 counts, Espy would face a potential sentence of more than 100 years in prison.

ESPY QUILTS AMID PROBE OF ETHICS

CABI

NET: SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE FACES ALLEGATIONS OF ABUSING PERQUISITES OF OFFICE. HE APPARENTLY HOPED TO SPARE THE ADMINISTRATION EMBARRASSMENT.

By SARA FRIT

Z and DAVID LAUTER, TIMES STAFF WRITERS Agriculture Secretary Mike Espy resigned abruptly Monday, apparently hoping to spare the Clinton Administration the embarrassment of an independent counsel's investigation of allegations that he abused the perquisites of office and improperly accepted sports tickets and trips from businesses. Espy's surprise decision to step down by Dec. 31 ended prematurely the once-promising tenure of the Administration's youngest Cabinet appointee and the first African American to serve as agriculture secretary. With the departure of Defense Secretary Les Aspin, Espy becomes the second Clinton Cabinet official to resign. The decision also proved to be a humiliating admission of defeat for the energetic young Espy, who had vowed to survive what he claimed were politically motivated and unsubstantiated allegations that he violated ethics laws by accepting the hospitality of such companies as Tyson Foods of Arkansas, Quaker Oats of Missouri and Sun Diamond of California. Meanwhile, The Times has learned, another Clinton Cabinet official whose actions are under scrutiny, Housing and Urban Development Secretary Henry G. Cisneros, has told White House officials that he is willing to step down, too, if the Justice Department determines that he misled the FBI before his appointment about payments in excess of $200,000 to a former woman friend. She has alleged that Cisneros agreed to pay the money to help alleviate damage to her career as a result of a romantic relationship between them some years ago. Espy, 40, a former Mississippi congressman, announced his resignation at a hastily scheduled news conference and insisted that he had not been asked to step down by the President or any other White House official. "This was my choice," he said. Nevertheless, his resignation came as the White House counsel's office was completing work on an internal review of the Espy matter that apparently uncovered reasons to challenge the agriculture secretary's contention that he had done nothing wrong. Among other things, the White House inquiry uncovered a previously unknown $1,200 "scholarship" that Pat Dempsey, a woman friend of Espy's, received from Tyson Foods. Sources said that White House Chief of Staff Leon E. Panetta and White House Counsel Abner J. Mikva briefed Espy last Friday on the preliminary results of their ryone knows he's not real happy with the way things are." Gray, the White House counsel, and other senior officials "are just fed up with it -- with the whole situation," said the official, speaking on the condition of anonymity. Gray has been assigned by the President to review Sununu's travel plans, to determine whether his use of Air Force jets for official travel is justified and to determine whether his use of corporate aircraft would pose a conflict of interest. The review process was established on May 9, after disclosures that Sununu had used the military aircraft for political and personal travel -- including a flight to Boston to visit his dentist and another to Colorado on a ski trip -- as well as for official trips. A week ago, it was disclosed that Sununu used a government automobile and driver to attend a stamp auction in New York. Sununu has said that the use of the planes and the car, which are equipped with telephones and, in the case of the aircraft, secure communications facilities, was required so that he could stay in constant contact with Washington. On Wednesday, the White House made available a list of five flights that Sununu took aboard different corporate aircraft, noting that Gray had approved each trip in advance. However, the list misidentified the provider of one of the planes. The White House said the aircraft was made available by Howard Bender, whose firm, Blake Construction Co., is a leading builder of government offices. But a Republican Party official told The Times that the plane had been leased from Bender by Stuart Bernstein, another Washington real estate figure, who, in turn, provided it to Sununu. Based on the erroneous information, Gray, who in the past has allied himself with Sununu on policy issues that divided the White House staff, had approved a flight Sununu made to Chicago on June 11 to attend a fund-raising event for the Republican Governors Assn., for which Sununu's wife, Nancy, works. "It's hard for him (Gray) to look good, having cleared one person and finding out later it was somebody else" who provided the airplane, said one senior White House official, speaking privately. "It's creating suspicion between the offices."

For Sununu, the immediate problem is to halt the increasingly public criticism he is facing -- a difficult job after having angered key figures throughout Washington dozens of times over the last 2 1/2 years with his often abrasive manner. But each time the matter seems about to fade from public scrutiny, a new development comes to light. "He keeps picking the scab off," the senior official said.

The Washington Post, 06/22/91:

Sununu Travel Rules Tightened

e Finds Counsel Was Misinformed By Ann Devroy, Charles R. Babcock, Washington Post Staff Writers White House Chief of Staff John H. Sununu was ordered last night to follow tough new rules governing his use of corporate airplanes, after an internal inquiry by the White House counsel's office determined he and his aides misinformed presidential counsel C. Boyden Gray about a trip he took to a political fund-raiser in Chicago on June 11, sources said. The new order to Sununu, delivered by Gray with President Bush's knowledge, is the latest of three rebukes dealt the chief of staff over the past six weeks, after questions were raised about his travel habits, first on military jets, then in his government limousine and now on corporate jets. Under last night's new rules, all future airplane travel by Sununu must be requested and approved in advance with an official travel authorization through the White House office of administration, a senior White House official said. Such flights can be arranged only by the "host organization" sponsoring the trip, and cannot be solicited by Sununu or his office. One source, who disagreed with those who described Sununu's actions as misleading, characterized the circumstances of the Chicago flight as a misunderstanding. This source said that the new "rules" were discussed after Sununu asked Gray last night for clarification that would avoid any future confusion. Other sources said, however, that the incident went well beyond a misunderstanding and had further strained already tense relations between Sununu and other senior White House officials. According to these sources, Sununu, his wife, Nancy Sununu, and his top political aide, Edward Rogers, arranged with a Washington developer and major GOP donor, Stuart A. Bernstein, to provide for a jet -- which Bernstein also paid for -- to take them to Chicago for a Republican Governors Association (RGA) fund-raising event. Under earlier rules set down for the use of corporate aircraft by the chief of staff and other officials last month, Sununu's office was supposed to provide Gray's office with Bernstein's name to check for possible conflicts of interest before the flight was approved. Instead, Sununu's office sent Gray a memorandum naming the plane's owners, Howard and Morton Bender and John Mason. The three, prominent Washington businessmen who own a jet charter company, had leased the plane to Bernstein -- whose name did not appear on the memorandum -- at a regular commercial cost of about $ 3,000 and apparently had no other involvement in the events. White House press secretary Marlin Fitzwater said last night that Sununu told him yesterday he was not aware that Bernstein -- in addition to arranging the flight -- had paid for it. Accounts of the Chicago trip by informed sources differed. According to those critical of Sununu's actions, Gray raised an immediate question about Howard Bender, asking aide Rogers whether it was the Washington businessman. Bender has extensive government contracts, and is also a director of the now-defunct Madison National Bank here that is being probed by several federal agencies. These sources said Rogers told Gray it was a different man, a "Chicago Bender," who did no business with the government. The counsel, having already rejected three other planes that had been offered for the Chicago trip because all three were owned by firms whose relations with the federal government put them in conflict with Gray's guidelines, approved the latest proposal, partially because the flight was to occur that day, June 11, and Sununu was said to be desperate for approval.

In a separate version of events, however, another source said that Gray had never asked Rogers directly about the identity of Bender. The memorandum sent from Sununu's office to Gray's about the trip "to" Chicago, the source said, mistakenly listed the plane's owners as being "from" Chicago. This week, the senior White House official said Gray began asking questions about the flight after inquiries by The Washington Post about why Bender, the Washington businessman, had been approved to provide the flight when that appeared to violate the existing conflict of interest test because of his federal contracts and the Madison investigation. At the same time, Gray was asked about additional information The Post had received indicating that although Sununu's memorandum had indicated Bender was paying for the flight, it actually had been financed by Bernstein. Gray determined that the Bender in question was, in fact, the Washington businessman. A Sununu flight provided by Bender, sources said, would have violated at least two of the then-existing rules of the White House counsel and would not have been approved if Gray had known. Gray also determined that Bernstein not only had paid for the flight, sources said, but that Bernstein had been solicited personally by Sununu, and had accompanied Sununu's party on the trip to Chicago.

There is no indication that Bernstein would not have been approved as sponsor of the flight if Gray had known of his involvement. Bernstein recently was appointed by Bush to a presidential commission to develop a prime piece of downtown property in Washington. But an examination of public records and other documents indicate no significant reason why Bernstein would have failed Gray's clearance. According to a White House official, Gray then launched an internal inquiry, which culminated yesterday, to determine the circumstances around the flight. He gathered all involved officials, including Sununu and Rogers, for a lengthy session to try to reconcile the various versions. Sununu did not respond to phone calls this week on the flight. Bernstein declined to return phone calls yesterday. Sources provided this account of Gray's internal probe of the Chicago trip. After the RGA asked Sununu to be the speaker at the event, it tried and failed to produce the jet he asked for. On the recommendation of former Illinois governor James R. Thompson, Ameritech Corp., one of the regional phone firms, agreed to provide the plane, but Gray rejected it because Ameritech is under heavy government regulations it is seeking to alter. Then Nancy Sununu, who raises funds for the RGA, asked Archer-Daniels-Midland Co., which also was rejected by Gray because its agribusiness interests are heavily regulated. Then Rogers contacted a defense contractor, Textron, but it was rejected for the same reasons. Finally, Sununu personally called Bernstein the day before the speech to seek a plane. Bernstein called back the next day, officials said, and informed Sununu he had gotten a plane from the Benders and Mason. The direct solicitation by Sununu violated rules issued by Gray that no direct solicitation should occur, and it directly contradicted White House press secretary Marlin Fitzwater's statement last Wednesday. Asked if there had been any direct solicitation of planes by Sununu, Fitzwater answered, "The governor says no. No solicitation by the governor." After yesterday's meeting, sources said, Gray briefed Bush and informed Sununu that all plane travel by him from today on must be judged under new standards and procedures. In effect, Sununu must now file an official travel authorization procedure that passes through both the White House office of administration and through the counsel's office. Sununu has been informed that he may not solicit directly or indirectly corporate air travel and that only a host organization, such as the RGA, can arrange for his plane. If the host is unable to do so, Sununu will not be able to fly. One source last night described Sununu's handling of the trip as inexplicable, noting that he simply could have taken a commercial plane if he had not found a corporate jet, or offered Bernstein's name for clearance. Sununu's latest problems grew out of a May order by Gray precluding him from using government planes for political travel. To continue his political fund-raising work, Sununu instead used corporate jets instead under procedures imposed by Gray. The new limits had come after the Washington Post and U.S. News & World Report revealed Sununu's frequent flights to political and personal events, such as the dentist and skiing trips, aboard government jets. The May rules required Sununu to submit to Gray the details of his trips, including the name of the corporation or individuals providing the plane. Last night's revelations came at the end of a trying week for Sununu who saw another of his modes of travel -- government limousine -- curtailed after reports of a daylong trip to New York June 12 for a stamp auction and other personal business followed by an evening fund-raiser. Bush, described as angered and upset over the judgment Sununu displayed in taking the New York trip after being the subject of one travel controversy defended him publicly. But Bush acknowledged that Sununu's decision to have his government driver take him on the five-hour trip to New York and spend the day driving him to personal business created an appearance problem and other sources said it would be the last trip of that type Sununu would take. Of the five political trips Sununu has taken the past month under the May rules, the most questions surrounded the Chicago flight. But other flights also featured donors with government contracts, raising questions about the thoroughness of Gray's inquiries. For example, on June 7, Fiber Materials Inc., of Biddeford, Maine, flew Sununu to Portland for a state party fund-raising event. Maurice Subilia Jr., president of the company, told the Los Angeles Times that about 60 percent of his firm's $40 million a year business is in Defense Department contracts. And on June 12, Beneficial Corp., a New Jersey-based financial services company, chartered a jet to fly Sununu and one of its lobbyists back to Washington after a fund-raiser and Sununu's visit to a stamp auction. Asked how Beneficial, which is reportedly involved in working against some of the administration's new banking regulations, passed muster with Gray, a source said Gray, pressed for time, was not conducting actual investigations of the corporate sponsor, simply cursory checks and relying on verbal orders issued that the sponsors not be heavily regulated by the government, not have business interests with the government that might be directly influenced by Sununu. "It is highly subjective," a source said. Howard Bender is head of Blake Construction, which has built several large federal office buildings in Washington. He was in the news in 1988 for arranging three years earlier to have the Bender Foundation give to a charity $40,000 a year for three years earmarked for the sa lary of Ursula Meese, wife of then-Attorney General Edwin Meese. In 1987, Bender and some associates made a 60 percent profit by selling an office building after obtaining a Justice Department lease to house a Justice Department agency there.

Commerce Chief's 'Warnaco flight' fuels debate

Robert

Mosbacher blamed for flying on Warnaco Inc.'s private plane By Steve Farnsworth WASHINGTON (FNS) -- When Commerce Secretary Robert Mosbacher returned to the U.S. from a recent free-trade promotional tour in southern Mexico, Warnaco, Inc., provided him with a free seat on a private plane. While Mosbacher's April 21 flight back from Huatulco, Mexico, with company president Linda J. Wachner does not violate government regulations, it provides fodder for the continuing controversy over what relationships between government and private business are appropriate. Both Wachner and a Commerce Department spokesman say no favors were requested and none was offered in return for the flight. "We have no special projects in front of the Commerce Department," Wachner said in an interview. Warnaco, a prominent New York-based manufacturer and marketer of women's and men's apparel in the U.S. and Mexico, could benefit from a free-trade agreement between the two countries. So, too, could other businesses -- including Amoco Co., Chicago, and Enron Corp., Houston -- that have given Mosbacher free flights to help promote free trade with Mexico. The airborne Wachner-Mosbacher meeting triggered both admiration and irritation from other lobbyists and executives. Mac L. Cates, first vice president of the American Textile Manufacturers Institute, rejected the theory that no special relationships necessarily develop when a corporation helps a government official. The ATMI, as the organization representing the domestic textile industry, opposes the reduction of trade barriers sought by Mosbacher and Wachner. "I would expect there are some friendships brought to such a situation, wouldn't you?" asked Cates, who is also chief executive officer of Arkwright Mills, Spartanburg, S.C. Cates said the Commerce Department should not be taking such gifts from businesses. "I think we pay enough in taxes for them to be out paying for that on their own hoof," Cates said. However, another observer connected to the domestic textile industry saw nothing suspect in Warnaco providing a flight for Mosbacher. John F. Nash Jr., Washington counsel for Milliken & Co., also of Spartanburg, said: "I would love to be able to do that and would hate for a law to be passed that would keep me from being able to do that." Nash said Mosbacher has been invited to visit the company's plants but has not done so, even though Milliken is one of the few companies to have won the department's Malcolm Baldrige National Quality Award. Milliken would be willing to provide the secretary with transportation, Nash said. The Commerce Department, for its part, said that accepting contributions from private corporations saves taxpayers money. Joseph P. O'Neill, a former president of the National Retail Federation, praised Wachner's ability to get her point across. "She is very adept at that," said O'Neill, now a Washington consultant. "She's very good. She is very creative and she presents her case very forcefully and very articulately." Wachner said she did not know how much Warnaco paid to lease the jet for the trip with Mosbacher. Washington-based corporate jet charter companies offer two-day roundtrips to Mexico City, closer to Washington than Huatulco, for roughly $ 16,000. The Warnaco flight was unusual for the textile, apparel and retail industries, which generally lobby through regular meetings between industry leaders and government officials in Washington, O'Neill said. The emphasis on executive meetings may seem modest when compared to offers of legislative working vacations at exclusive resorts or posh locales by lobbyists for the tobacco, real estate and other industries, O'Neill said. But CEO meetings with administration officials are quite valuable, particularly in an environment where government executives are increasingly concerned about appearing "owned" by special interests and shun many of the working vacations offered by industry, O'Neill said. "The most effective lobbyists we have are the CEOs," O'Neill said.

Commerce is one of the few government agencies authorized to accept contributions from private industry. Officials at other agencies with similar authority, such as the Agriculture Department and the Department of Housing and Urban Development, said they always pay their own way because of possible conflicts of interest. In much of the rest of government, ethics rules are far more stringent than at Commerce. Some government agencies, including the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative, refuse to accept even a lunch from domestic manufacturers because of the potential appearance of a conflict of interest. Ethics has become a major issue in Washington in recent months, particularly with the extensive coverage of John Sununu, President Bush's chief of staff, and his use of government planes to travel to his dentist and to the ski slopes. This week, Sununu triggered a new round of criticism for having his government driver take him to a New York stamp auction and for reportedly soliciting corporations to provide him with corporate jets for personal and political trips.

BUSH CITES 'APPEARANCE PROBLEM' WITH SUNUNU

ETHICS: THE PRESIDENT CA

LLS HIS AIDE'S CAR TRIP TO NEW YORK APPROPRIATE AS MORE FLIGHTS ON CORPORATE PLANES ARE DISCLOSED. By JAMES GERSTENZANG and SARA FRITZ, TIMES STAFF WRITERS

White House Chief of Staff John H. Sununu's travel arrangements have created "an appearance problem," President Bush said Wednesday, as the White House disclosed that Sununu flew to Chicago last week aboard an airplane owned by a key executive in a construction and real estate company that does extensive business with the U.S. government. With Sununu looking on impassively, Bush told reporters that his top aide's use of a government automobile and driver to travel to New York for a stamp auction "was appropriate," and that what matters is not appearances, but fact. "There's plenty of reason that this was done, and it doesn't set a precedent," he said, adding that Sununu is "doing a first-class job" and has been the victim of "piling-on" by the news media. Still, even as Bush defended his embattled chief of staff, he conceded for the first time that the travel flap created "an appearance problem" for the Administration. As the President moved to douse the latest controversy to swirl around Sununu, there were these developments: -- The White House disclosed that between May 20 and Tuesday evening, Sununu used corporate aircraft five times to attend GOP fund-raising events. One of the trips, to Chicago to raise money for the Republican Governors' Association, was aboard an airplane owned in part by Howard Bender, the White House aide. His company, Blake Construction Co., builds and leases buildings for the government, and Bender figured prominently in a 1988 independent counsel's probe of allegations concerning former Atty. Gen. Edwin Meese III's personal finances. -- It was learned that Sununu used his family car to make a roughly eight-hour round trip from Washington to Williamsburg, Va., to attend a Republican Senate Campaign Committee fund-raising event last Friday and Saturday. The next day, during an appearance on a Sunday talk show, he defended his use of a government car a few days earlier for the New York trip because, he said, his job required him to be in constant touch with the White House. "I have to be able to communicate, to work on sensitive papers, to coordinate the White House activities, even while I'm traveling," Sununu said on the ABC News program "This Week with David Brinkley." For the second day in a row, Sununu's office refused to answer a reporter's questions about his travel. In a speech Tuesday evening in Des Moines -- which he reached aboard an airplane lent by an insurance company -- Sununu showed no inclination to retreat, insisting that he would not take advice from "self-styled experts" on how or when he would travel. The White House on Wednesday said "two or three" of Sununu's requests for approval of other flights aboard corporate planes were rejected by the President's counsel, C. Boyden Gray. It would not disclose the owners of the aircraft or the reasons for rejection.

ng the use of the planes by Sununu, other than to say they involved a potential conflict of interest. Nevertheless, the use of the airplane owned by Bender, whose business has been closely linked to the federal government, spotlighted the difficulty in finding corporate sponsors without raising the potential of a conflict of interest. Bender came under investigation because in 1985 he funded a $40,000 salary for Meese's wife, Ursula, at the National Capital Chapter of the Multiple Sclerosis Society, at a time when his company was negotiating with the Justice Department to renew a lease on a building he owned. The independent counsel found that, although Bender "may have had ulterior motives" in providing the salary for Ursula Meese, there was no evidence that his efforts played a role in persuading the Justice Department to renew the lease. Bender could not be reached for comment Wednesday. In addition to the flight aboard corporate jets to Chicago on June 11 and Des Moines on Tuesday, the White House said Sununu made these trips: -- To St. Louis and back, on May 20, aboard a jet provided by Donald Bryant, who runs an executive benefits firm, to attend a fund-raising event for Republican Gov. John Ashcroft. -- To Portland, Me., and back, on June 7, aboard an airplane provided by Fiber Materials Inc., of Biddeford, Me., to take part in a fund-raising event for the Maine Republican Party. -- And, as previously disclosed, on June 12, from Morristown, N.J., to Washington, aboard a jet provided by the Beneficial Corp., a credit company, after attending the New York stamp auction and then a GOP fund-raiser in New Jersey. Bryant said he was asked by Missouri Republican Party officials to provide round-trip air transportation for Sununu. He said he agreed because he intended to be in Washington anyway on the day Sununu wanted to fly to St. Louis. Sununu and an aide, Edward M. Rogers, flew with Bryant aboard his Lockheed Jetstar. The plane then took Sununu and Rogers back to Washington later that night and returned to St. Louis without any passengers. Bryant, who estimates that the jet costs $1,500 an hour to operate, was not reimbursed for the flight. Party officials told Bryant that he was chosen to transport Sununu primarily because he has no business interests with the federal government. "I was not lobbying for anything," he said. Officials of Fiber Materials Inc. did not return telephone calls for comment on the June 7 flight provided for Sununu. One of the company's executives, Maurice Subilia Jr., is an occasional contributor to GOP candidates. He lives in Kennebunkport, Me., near Bush's vacation residence. Bush's comments Wednesday about Sununu's travel were his first in public since Newsweek magazine disclosed that the chief of staff -- whose use of Air Force jets to travel on personal and political business was cut back by Bush on May 9 -- used the government car for the 225-mile trip to New York on June 12. Bush said: "When you look at the facts surrounding this particular trip, this beating that he's taken is unwarranted, in my view. Nobody likes the appearance of impropriety. On the other hand, I think fairness dictates you ought to look at the particular fact about it. "We had heavy -- a lot of very important negotiation on legislation. We have a very important speech that needed fine-tuning. He knew I wasn't happy with that. He made plenty of phone calls." The President gave a speech that night to about 2,000 guests on the White House South Lawn in which he criticized congressional Democrats and pressed for approval of several Administration domestic programs. Bush also said his defense of Sununu "doesn't say anybody that has access to a (government) car can go anywhere anyone wants at any time." The President, speaking with reporters during a picture-taking session at the start of a meeting with House Republican leaders, said he had discussed the matter with Sununu. Staff writers David Lauter and Dwight Morris contributed to this story.

Bush cites 'appearance problem' in Sununu trips

White House

backs car use but hints limit

By Michael Kranish and Walter V. Robinson, Globe

Staff President Bush acknowledged yesterday that his chief of staff, John H.

Sununu, has created an "appearance problem" in his travels in government cars a nd corporate jets. Later, Marlin Fitzwater, the White House spokesman, said he doubted that Sununu would take many more long-distance limousine trips. The spokesman said, however, that there has been no impropriety when Sununu and other administration officials have flown to political events on corporate jets. He said that under administration policy, the White House counsel reviews each corporate-sponsored trip to ensure there is no conflict of interest. In two instances, Sununu has not been allowed to fly on corporate aircraft because the White House counsel determined that there could be a conflict of interest, the White House said yesterday. The corporate sponsors of the two rejected flights were not identified. During a brief exchange with reporters yesterday, Bush said that the former New Hampshire governor's travel was "appropriate . . . given the circumstances." But Bush then added, "I recognize, and I think the governor does, there's an appearance problem." Sununu this year lost some of his government air travel privileges after it was reported that he sometimes flew on personal business, including two trips to a Boston dentist. He became embroiled in a second travel controversy after it was reported that he was driven a week ago in his government limousine to a New York City stamp auction. Sununu returned to Washington aboard a corporate jet. Bush, noting that Sununu placed White House telephone calls while traveling to New York, said: "The facts surrounding this particular trip, this beating that he's taken, is unwarranted, in my view. . . . Nobody likes the appearance of impropriety. On the other hand, I think fairness dictates you ought to look at the particular fact of that." Though Sununu said on Sunday that he would continue to travel in his limousine whenever he wanted, Bush yesterday appeared to contradict him. "It doesn't set a precedent," Bush said. "It doesn't say anyone that has access to a car can go anywhere that anyone wants at any time." Sununu had said he should be able to use his limousine at will because it is "in the national interest" that he have access to a secure telephone so he can conduct business for the president. Fitzwater, referring to Sununu's five-hour limousine drive to New York to conduct personal business, said Bush believes that it would be "a one-time-only thing, or at least a very rare occurrence because of circumstances that day - not something that happens frequently or that we would expect to happen again." Fitzwater, asked if Bush had discussed the appearance of impropriety with Sununu, responded: "The president and the governor discussed this, and they're both concerned about the appearances, and I'm sure the governor will pay attention to that fact." White House officials implied that Sununu would not continue such travel. "Car trips, I doubt if he'll make many more of those," Fitzwater said. Sununu has brushed off the controversy. The chief of staff on Tuesday took his fifth corporate-sponsored flight in the last month, flying to Des Moines to address a Republican fundraiser. The flight was paid for by Kirke/Van Orsdel Inc., an Iowa insurance company. "Frankly we'd rather listen to you than the self-styled experts in Washington, D.C.," Sununu told the 1,500 Republicans. "You can't get here without traveling. I know that's a very complicated concept for some." In the wake of the latest revelations, prominent Republicans said yesterday that the issue has begun to cause Bush some slight political harm and he must move to force Sununu to change his behavior. "People who are very protective of Bush are now raising the alarm at the White House," said one Republican with longstanding ties to Bush. Among those who have spoken to Bush with such a warning, another Republican said, is Secretary of State James A. Baker 3d. In interviews yesterday, several Republicans said Sununu's propensity for stylish travel has ceased being an issue that had Republicans chortling and has become an issue that could cause Bush significant damage if left to fester. The nation's voters, said one of Bush's political advisers, "are extremely frustrated. They feel the government is out of control, that it doesn't do anything, that it doesn't listen to them, that they are paying more in taxes and getting less. And along comes Sununu, and with this issue he personifies all this." However, another Republican, a pollster, said that Sununu's travel habits have yet to undercut Bush politically. But he said Sununu's use of chartered jets and limousines has served to reinforce one of the Republican Party's major perceived negative images. "Having a chief of sta ff so disconnected from the concerns of average Americans that he takes a limousine to New York to buy stamps at Christie's underscores the image of a political party that is for the rich and the powerful, a party that is out of touch, elitist and privileged," the pollster said. In testimony to the fact that Sununu's power remains largely undiminished, however, none of the Republican critics was willing to be quoted by name. One said he declined to appear this week on a network television interview show, knowing that he would have been asked about the chief of staff's predicament. "If I had defended him, I would have been a hypocrite. If I had criticized him, it would have cost me dearly," this Republican said. Another GOP strategist said he believes the public is starting to pay attention to the issue, following initial disclosures that, he said, had little impact outside Washington. For the public, this strategist said, the limousine ride to New York "had an in-your-face feel to it. I think this is starting to hurt the president." Sununu's behavior, he said, "is now too much in contrast to Bush's own image, as a decent, honorable guy with a strong sense of ethics." This strategist, who said he has discussed the issue recently with Sununu, said the chief of staff "portrays himself as a man wronged, and still willing to confront his adversaries on this."

President Curbs Sununu's Limo By Susan Page

In another implicit rebuke of his top aide's personal judgment, President George Bush yesterday made it clear that White House Chief of Staff John Sununu no longer would be using his chauffeured government limousine for personal out-of-town travel such as last week's trip to New York for a rare stamp auction. "I recognize, and I think the governor [Sununu] does, there's an appearance problem . . .," Bush told reporters at a picture-taking session in the Cabinet Room. "I think when you have an appearance problem, I think all of us would agree you want to try to avoid it as much as possible." Last month, the president restricted Sununu's access to government planes in the wake of reports he had used them to visit his dentist and go skiing. But the White House continued yesterday to defend the use of corporate planes for political trips by Sununu; by Marilyn Quayle, the wife of Vice President Dan Quayle; and by senior presidential aides. Sununu routinely requires Republican groups and campaigns that want him to appear at fund-raising dinners or other events to arrange a private plane for his use, according to a White House official. Under most states' laws, corporations can provide planes for the use of political organizations and campaigns. Under federal law regulating presidential and congressional campaigns, the corporation must be reimbursed the equivalent of first-class fare aboard a commercial flight - a fraction of the actual cost of operating the private plane. Sununu has been using corporate planes since he lost his authority to command military ones, the White House said. The president, who was surprised and dismayed by that dispute last month, also appeared taken aback by reports over the weekend of Sununu's limousine trip, according to one key adviser. Sununu said on Sunday it was "in the national interest" for him to have used the car on his way to New York so he could make telephone calls to handle government business. However, cellular phones are available on Amtrak and the Washington-New York air shuttle, and Sununu sometimes carries a portable White House telephone. By using the car, he avoided having to pay for a commercial flight, ride Amtrak or pay the government the equivalent of commercial air fare for using a military plane. Sununu caught a ride home on a corporate jet after attending a GOP fund raiser in New Jersey. When Fitzwater was asked if Bush had urged Sununu to be more sensitive to the appearance of impropriety, he replied, "The president and the governor discussed this, and they're both concerned about the appearances, and I'm sure the governor will pay attention to that fact." He added, deadpan: "Car trips, I doubt if he'll make many more of those." But the president nt didn't directly criticize Sununu, the former New Hampshire governor whose support in 1988 helped rescue Bush's floundering presidential campaign. "He's doing a first-class job," the president said, saying Sununu's job was safe and accusing the news media of "a piling-on syndrome." And Sununu was notably unrepentant at a political fund raiser in Des Moines Tuesday night - a trip made aboard a corporate jet provided by Kirke-Van Orsdel Inc., an insurance company. "You can't get here without traveling," Sununu said sarcastically. "I know that's a very complicated concept for some." According to the White House counsel's office, Sununu also has accepted corporate rides from insurance executive Donald Bryant, for a May 20 trip to St. Louis; Fiber Materials Inc. of Biddeford, Maine, for a June 7 trip to Portland, Maine; and Beneficial Corp., for a June 12 trip from Morristown, N.J.

The Boston Globe, 06/19/91:

Officials' use of corporate planes hit By Stephen Kurkjian, Globe Staff A new federal travel policy that went into effect in March allows government officials, including the embattled White House chief of staff, John H. Sununu, almost unlimited use of corporate transportation even when its acceptance may appear to constitute a conflict of interest, critics said yesterday. Common Cause, an ethics watchdog group, and Democratic congressmen expressed anger over the practice, which has allowed Sununu, Commerce Secretary Robert A. Mosbacher and other administration officials to accept free plane trips from companies and other private groups. The policy, which took effect on the recommendation of the White House, drew criticism yesterday following the disclosure that Sununu had flown back to Washington from a Republican fund-raiser in New Jersey last week aboard a plane provided by a politically active consumer credit firm. White House officials said yesterday that the flight was one of three or four that had been solicited on Sununu's behalf in recent weeks since the chief of staff was denied access to US military jets to travel to political events or for personal reasons. Among his other corporate flights to political events were round trips to Chicago and St. Louis. Yesterday, President Bush was described as "upset, angry and perplexed" about Sununu's use of a government limousine for a trip to New York, the first leg of the trip from which he returned on a corporate jet, the Washington Post reported. Sources said that Bush contacted a senior political adviser Sunday to discuss how to handle the controversy after learning of Sununu's decision to have a government car and driver take him to New York last Wednesday. Sununu attended a rare stamp auction and conducted other personal business but no official duties there, officials said. Bush apparently made his call after Sununu defended himself on television Sunday. Meanwhile, Sununu traveled aboard a corporate jet to Iowa yesterday to attend another political fund-raiser, according to today's edition of The Los Angeles Times. Sununu, accompanied by his chief deputy, flew to Des Moines aboard an airplane owned by Kirke-Van Orsdel Inc. for the Iowa Republican Party's annual Abraham Lincoln dinner, a $ 50-a-person fund-raising event. Kirke-Van Orsdel is a 17-year-old insurance company that, according to a source active in Iowa politics, writes group insurance policies. Its chairman, Gerald M. Kirke, has been active in Republican Party circles in recent years, the source said, and the company contributed $ 5,000 to the Republican National Committee before the 1990 elections. According to federal records, dozens of middle- and upper-level US officials have accepted trips aboard corporate jets or had their travel paid for by corporate sponsors to make speeches, attend seminars or other work-related functions since the government adopted a unified travel policy for federal employees March 1. That policy allows for corporate and other privately reimbursed travel as long as the trips are approved in advance by the ethics officer in an individual department. The ethics officials can allow trips where conflicts of interest might exist, the guidelines show. They say that trips can be accepted if the ethics officials determine the employee's participation in the event outweighs concern that acceptance of the trip may appear to improperly influence the employee's performance of his or her duties. Among those who have had trips paid for under the new policy were Mosbacher, who has taken eight corporate-sponsored trips since March; Michael J. Boskin, Bush's chief economic adviser, who was flown to a Republican fund-raising breakfast in San Francisco; and D. Allan Bromley, Bush's science adviser, who traveled to Rochester, N.Y., Columbus, Ohio, and Savannah, Ga. Fred Wertheimer, president of Common Cause, the citizens' lobbying group that has fought for reform in political campaigns and lobbying, said the policy, which allows corporate America to finance travel of any federal officials, should be changed. "The argument is being made that the taxpayers are being saved money. The question is at what expense and at whose expense," Wertheimer said. "The Bush administration's weakening of the law was wrong and should be reversed." "It's an invitation for abuse," said Rep. Barney Frank, Democrat of Newton, who chairs the Judiciary subcommittee that routinely examines ethics issues. "If corporate travel is to be allowed, it should be only under the most extreme circumstances." The White House spokesman, Marlin Fitzwater, countered: "It's all fine, according to the law, according to the rules and regulations." He added that "corporations are allowed to donate what's called in-kind services" to political groups or individuals. "And that donation can take the form of use of their private aircraft." The White House instituted a separate travel policy for Sununu last month following the disclosure that he had used US military jets more than 75 times during the past two years to attend official, political and personal functions. Under this separate policy, Sununu can only use the military planes to take him to "official functions," and then only if the travel is authorized by the office of the White House counsel, C. Boyden Gray. If the trips involve "political functions," Sununu must find some other means of transportation. If corporations arrange or pay for his travel, the trips must also be approved by Gray's office. White House officials said that, though they did not know if President Bush was aware that Sununu had been soliciting corporations to assist his travel, last week's flight aboard a plane provided by the Beneficial Corp., of Peapack, N.J., had been approved by the White House counsel's office. The owners and executives of Beneficial, which is actively opposing the administration's bank reform legislation, gave about $ 175,000 in personal and political action committee contributions to Republican and Democratic congressional candidates in 1989 and 1990. "It was considered and approved as not violating the conflict of interest standards," said one official, who asked not to be identified. "We look to determine if there is a real conflict problem or a problem of perception in accepting these trips, and we've not found any yet." The official said that Gray's office also approved Sununu's round trip to St. Louis on May 20 aboard a plane provided by a Missouri business executive and a round-trip flight provided by an unidentified corporate sponsor to Chicago on June 11 to attend a fund-raiser sponsored by the Republican Governors' Association. According to Republican and White House sources, the trips were solicited on Sununu's behalf by GOP officials, who were anxious to have Sununu attend the fund-raisers. One national GOP official, who declined to be identified, said Sununu's office has told party officials that if they want to schedule him to appear at a fund-raiser they must arrange for him to fly to and from the event on a corporate or chartered plane. Donald Bryant, a Missouri businessman, said Missouri GOP officials prevailed upon him to have Sununu flown to and from St. Louis last month to attend the party's fund-raiser on behalf of Gov. John Ashcroft. The unified travel policy was proposed by Gray in 1989 to a bipartisan task force that was considering changes in the ethics regulations for federal employees. Gray told the task force that the rules on whether federal employees could accept trips on corporate jets or have their travel reimbursed by private firms varied throughout the government. Some departments, such as Commerce and Treasury, allowed their officials to accept the trips from all private companies, while other agencies only allowed their employees to accept travel paid for by nonprofit groups. Still other agencies prohibited their employees from accepting any travel from an outside group. The task force went along with Gray's recommendation. In March, the General Services Administ review and gave him until Monday to decide how to respond. They were said to have left little doubt that they wanted him to quit. "We didn't want this to linger," said a senior official, adding that White House officials were determined in this case to avoid the criticism they had received for failing to obtain the prompt resignation of Deputy Treasury Secretary Roger C. Altman after he was accused of lying to a congressional committee. In a statement accepting Espy's resignation, the President said he was troubled by the appearance of conflict of interest created by Espy's acceptance of favors from industry sources and he concluded that the secretary's resignation was suitable. "Over the last few weeks . . . the Office of the White House Counsel has reviewed information about Secretary Espy and the actions he took while in office," Clinton said. "Although Secretary Espy has said he has done nothing wrong, I am troubled by the appearance of some of these incidents and believe his decision to leave is appropriate. " Yet because Espy's resignation does not take effect for three months, Clinton will not be forced to face the politically sensitive task of selecting a successor until after the November election. Among the contenders to succeed him are Ruth Harkin, wife of Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), and Robert Rominger, former California agriculture secretary. While Espy's resignation spares Clinton the political damage of having a sitting Cabinet member under a cloud, it nonetheless does nothing to limit Espy's own legal liability. The investigation of Espy will continue under independent counsel Donald C. Smaltz. Among other things, Smaltz is investigating Espy's acceptance of lodging at the picturesque Tyson Management Center after a speech to the Arkansas Poultry Federation and his return trip to Washington aboard a Tyson corporate jet. Dempsey accompanied him on that trip and also enjoyed the Tyson company's hospitality. In addition, Espy and Dempsey attended a National Football League playoff game as guests of Tyson. For Clinton, the allegations against Espy related to Tyson Foods were the most politically volatile. The President has often been accused of accepting favors from the head of the corporation, Don Tyson, a prominent Democrat in Clinton's home state of Arkansas. In addition, some critics claim that while Espy was accepting personal favors from Tyson Foods, his department was slow to act on proposals to improve poultry industry inspections -- a charge the secretary has vehemently denied. Tyson Foods issued a statement Monday reiterating "that our contacts with the secretary were handled appropriately and that at no time did we ever seek special or preferential treatment from anyone at the USDA." Espy's support at the White House apparently dried up a few days ago when his lawyer, Reid Weingarten, told Clinton's lawyers belatedly about the Tyson "scholarship" for Dempsey. He insisted that she obtained the money without Espy's assistance but White House officials concluded that it had the appearance of an illegal indirect favor to Espy. Dempsey is said to have received the $1,200 last fall from a foundation run by Tyson, even though Espy has said that he discouraged her at the time from taking it. She recently returned the money after Espy's ethics came under scrutiny, according to one official. Espy has contended that agribusiness gifts to Dempsey did not violate the law. Among the other potential ethical violations being investigated by Smaltz:

- * Espy's alleged request to Quaker Oats to provide him tickets to a Chicago Bulls National Basketball Assn. playoff game.
- * A lavish birthday party for Espy co-hosted by his old college friend, Richard Douglas, a senior vice president of Sun Diamond, a company that benefits from the millions of dollars spent by the Agriculture Department to promote U.S. products overseas.
- * A lucrative Agriculture Department contract given to Patricia Jensen, a friend to Douglas. Douglas and Jensen are known to frequently socialize with Espy and Dempsey.
- * Dempsey's employment by a firm that frequently lobbies the Agriculture Department for agribusiness clients.
- * At least 20 trips that Espy made at government expense to his home state of Mississippi during his first 20 months in office and his decision to charge the government for the lease of a Jeep Cherokee that he drove when he was in Mississippi. While federal ethics laws prohibit all Cabinet members from soliciting gratuities or accepting gifts that might influence them in their official capacity, Espy, as agriculture secretary, is also bound by the even more restrictive provisions of the ration and the US Office of Government Ethics promulgated the new rules.

Sununu Finds New Wings

Aide turns to corporate jets after Bush set limits By Susan Page White House Chief of Staff John Sununu may soon start to wish he had just stayed home. First, he lost his unrestricted use of government jets May 9 after it was reported he had taken dozens of military flights to ski, visit his dentist and go home to New Hampshire. Then, on Sunday, he was forced to defend himself for having used his chauffeured government limousine to go to New York City last week to buy $ 5,000 worth of rare stamps for his collection. Yesterday, his frequent-flying habits were back in the news with the disclosure in The Los Angeles Times that he has been soliciting free rides on corporate jets since his use of government planes was limited. The day of the rare -stamp auction, it turned out, he asked for and got a ride home on a Beneficial Corp. jet after attending a Republican fund raiser in New Jersey. And, the newspaper reported today that Sununu flew to Des Moines yesterday aboard a corporate airplane for an Iowa Republican party fund-raising dinner. The plane belongs to Kirke-Van Orsdel Inc., an insurance company that is active in Iowa politics . "It's all fine according to the law, according to the rules and regulations," Marlin Fitzwater, President George Bush's press secretary, said yesterday in circumspect public comments that neither criticized Sununu nor offered much of a defense. "There are many cases where it's justified and proper." He went on: "The president has full confidence in the governor. I don't know what he feels about this case." Some advisers close to Bush say they doubt Sununu's latest travel troubles will affect his standing with his boss. "I think right now it appears that there is a piling on John Sununu . . . and I think the president recognizes it," said James Lake, a Republican consultant who was a senior aide in Bush's 1988 campaign. But others, unwilling to be identified by name, say Sununu's stock must be falling with Bush, who put ethical propriety at the top of his priorities when he took office. "I'm sure this will upset him," a former senior White House aide said. "It's unseemly. People who work in the White House are not for sale." And there is considerable speculation about who might be leaking damaging information about Sununu, whose bombastic and overbearing manner has created a large group of suspects. In New Hampshire, where he served as governor, one popular political button once showed Sununu's face and read, "Will Rogers Never Met This Man." Under the 1989 Ethics Reform Act, top administration officials are allowed to accept flights on corporate jets; in some cases, the companies are reimbursed by political organizations that invited the official. The Los Angeles Times reported the state Republican Party in Iowa said it is paying approximately $ 2,500 toward Sununu's corporate jet trip there yesterday. But some Bush aides expressed wonderment at Sununu's apparent unwillingness to take commercial flights, even after the president's implicit rebuke in restricting the chief of staff's authority to command government planes. They said the corporate flights raise at least the appearance of impropriety. "They say Sununu is n't going to consider issues involving the company [that provides the jet], but that's like saying he's not going to talk about tax policy or environmental policy," scoffed a senior Republican strategist. Beneficial, for instance, has lobbied against the Bush administration's pending banking overhaul. Fitzwater said Sununu has taken at least three or four other flights aboard corporate jets since May 9[THE FOLLOWING APPEARED IN THE NS VERSION* that barred him from using government planes on most personal and political trips. But the White House declined to provide a list of the trips or to identify the corporations involved.]

SUNUNU USING CORPORATE JETS FOR FREE TR

AVEL

By SARA FRITZ and DAVID LAUTER, TIMES STAFF WRITERS Ever since the White House cut back on John H. Sununu's use of military aircraft for leisure and political travel, the controversial chief of staff has been soliciting free trips aboard jets provided by American corporations, White House officials said Monday. In the latest instance, Beneficial Corp., a consumer credit firm headquartered in Peapack, N.J., provided a chartered jet for Sununu to return to Washington from a New York stamp auction and a New Jersey GOP fund-raiser last Wednesday night. Officials said other corporations are being asked to do likewise whenever Sununu makes similar trips. Sununu pays nothing for these corporate flights, which are perfectly legal. Beneficial officials said they expect to receive only partial reimbursement from the New Jersey Republican Party for Sununu's flight last week. In turning to corporations, Sununu is one of a growing number of top Administration officials who have come to rely on American business to provide air travel for trips that previously would have been funded by the government or paid for out of their own pockets. Commerce Secretary Robert A. Mosbacher has taken more than 30 trips on planes provided by corporations since he took office 2 1/2 years ago. Although others have been criticized for flying on corporate jets, officials said Sununu sees no potential conflict of interest in accepting travel accommodations from corporations, even those with intense interest in changing government policies. Beneficial, for example, has been actively involved in battling banking industry reforms proposed by the Bush Administration. Sununu has said that he must rely on corporate jets in order to remain in constant touch with the White House. "I have to be able to communicate, to work on sensitive papers, to coordinate the White House activities, even while I'm traveling," he said on Sunday. But Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), after he was told of Sununu's flight at the expense of Beneficial, said, "I think it's a mistake; that's why you have conflict of interest laws." Frank added, "What would be so terrible about flying in a regular plane like a normal person?" White House officials said Sununu is unlikely to be swayed by such criticism. "Sununu doesn't play by your rules, or our rules, or Washington rules," one official said. "He plays by his rules and he's not going to change." Until recently, it was illegal for top Administration officials to accept free travel from American corporations. But the law was changed to permit such trips at the request of President Bush as part of the Ethics Reform Act, enacted in late 1989. White House officials said Sununu began soliciting flights from corporations shortly after Bush imposed a new White House travel policy May 9 that barred the chief of staff from using military aircraft for all political and most personal trips. Under the previous policy, Sununu had used military aircraft to take a ski vacation and visit his dentist in New Hampshire. The officials said that before the Beneficial flight, Sununu had used corporate jets "three or four times." Although the officials said Beneficial is not the only corporation that has provided transportation for the chief of staff since his use of military aircraft was cut back, they declined to identify the other firms that have done so. As one aide explained, Sununu is in such demand to attend political functions around the country that he has no trouble finding someone to provide him an aircraft. Another official said Sununu's attitude toward the corporations that provide the planes is: "As long as they pay, that's fine." Beneficial spokesman Bob Wade said his company initially was asked to provide a round-trip chartered flight for Sununu to attend the New Jersey GOP fund-raiser last Wednesday night. The event was held at Hamilton Farm, a facility that Beneficial owns in Bedminster, N.J., a town in the horse country of western New Jersey about an hour's drive from New York City. After the company chartered an aircraft for Sununu, Wade said, White House officials said he would use it to return to Washington but not to go to New Jersey. Instead, Sununu traveled in a government-provided limousine first to New York City, where he attended the stamp auction. It was not clear how he then traveled to New Jersey. The limousine returned to Washington without a passenger.

er. A New Jersey state party official, who declined to be identified, said he was told by the White House: " 'Don't worry about getting him here,' just take care of the return trip." Wade said that Beneficial's Washington representative, Gary Perkinson, flew to New Jersey aboard the chartered jet alone, and returned with Sununu. He said Perkinson did some corporate business while he was in the New Jersey area, but he acknowledged that Perkinson would not have flown in a chartered plane had Sununu not requested one. Sununu and Perkinson discussed "everything from hockey to education" on the return flight, according to Wade. He said the subject of banking reform legislation did not come up. Beneficial is a politically active firm whose chairman, Finn M. W. Caspersen, along with his son, made $42,750 in contributions to Democratic and Republican candidates in the last congressional elections. At the same time, the Beneficial PAC made $129,475 in contributions to congressional candidates and the company was responsible for $45,000 in so-called "soft money" contributions to the Democratic and Republican parties. Wade said his firm expects to be reimbursed for Sununu's flight from the state GOP at an amount equivalent to first-class fare, which will not cover the cost of chartering the plane. Under New Jersey law, corporations are permitted to make such contributions to state political parties. Sununu will be billed by the White House for some of the cost of his limousine trip to New York City, according to a White House official. The cost is unknown. He said Sununu is not disturbed that the trip has received attention in the press. "He's got a thick skin," the official said.

COUNTLESS REGULATIONS GOVERN BEHAVIOR FOR U.S. OFFICIAL

S. BUT VIRTUALLY UNADDRESSED IS ONE HUGE PERQUISITE OF PUBLIC LIFE -- FLYING ON

of nuclear power for the Tennessee Valley Authority until early 1989, commuted every week in a government-chartered jet between his Virginia home and the TVA's headquarters in Tennessee. The cost to the taxpayers: $172,700. FBI Director William S. Sessions, who travels regularly on a government-owned jet seized from narcotics traffickers, extended one of his business trips in 1989 to enjoy a leisurely day in his hometown of San Antonio. Not until congressional investigators began looking into Sessions' travel did he decide to reimburse the government for his flight. Commerce Secretary Robert A. Mosbacher occasionally travels to speaking engagements on jets provided by American corporations. But there are no federal regulations requiring Mosbacher to disclose such arrangements, even though he may someday be making decisions affecting the companies involved. As the stories of White, Sessions and Mosbacher clearly illustrate, White House Chief of Staff John H. Sununu -- who has been criticized for taking personal trips on military aircraft -- is by no means the only high-ranking official who appears to be taking advantage of this patchwork system of policies governing official travel. While the federal government has written thousands of pages of regulations setting strict operating standards for almost every other aspect of official behavior, one thing that remains virtually unregulated is what may be the biggest perk of public life today: free travel by government aircraft. Although the Office of Management and Budget has set some broad guidelines governing the acquisition and operation of government-owned planes, each agency generally sets its own standards for official travel by high-ranking Administration appointees. As a result, abuses of federally paid travel are believed to be rampant. Federal documents show that officials often travel on expensive government-owned airplanes to locations served regularly by commercial airlines.

Sometimes they do not reimburse the government for the portions designated as personal travel. And there is no guidance available for allowing spouses to accompany officials on such trips. White House officials said Thursday that regardless of what befalls Sununu personally, the flap over the chief of staff's travels almost certainly will spur the President to tighten current guidelines. "The President wants to avoid even the appearance of impropriety," one official said.

ys. "We've got to demand higher standards." The lack of any coherent policy governing high-level travel -- and the resulting abuses, as underscored in recent days by the Sununu affair -- has brought a growing clamor from Congress for the Administration to tighten its guidelines. "There is no consistent policy in the executive branch," complains Rep. Bob Wise (D-W.Va.), who chairs a House Government Operations subcommittee. "There is some flying fast-and-loose out there and it needs to be reined in . . . Our experience is that each agency sets its own policy, and often they don't even have a real, written policy." On Thursday, Rep. Frank Horton (R-N.Y.), a senior Republican on the House Government Operations Committee, called for a broad investigation by the General Accounting Office of the use of airplanes by all senior officials, not just Sununu. He said he wanted to know "whether the policies are consistent and uniform for both branches, whether they are adequate to prevent abuse" and "whether sufficient enforcement safeguards exist to ensure policy compliance." Travel at taxpayer expense is still largely viewed in Washington as a matter of individual preference for Cabinet-level appointees. And most members of Congress are reluctant to make an issue of these abuses since they also are sometimes criticized for using military aircraft to make needless junkets to far-off places. In fact, just last year, lawmakers loyal to House Speaker Thomas S. Foley (D-Wash.) tried to push through legislation that would have given him full-time access to a $19-million military executive jet. The measure was quickly dropped after nationwide press accounts embarrassed the ordinarily frugal Speaker. Although the General Services Administration has firm regulations governing travel by federal bureaucrats, none of them specifically addresses the unique problems faced by high-level Administration appointees. As a result, most Cabinet-level officials have wide latitude when it comes to deciding how they will travel. Furthermore, many of the GSA's general guidelines governing travel by lower-level officials plainly are outdated. GSA regulation FPMRA 40, for example, authorizes officials to claim government reimbursement for "steamer-chairs, steamer-cushions, steamer-rugs and other expenses." Sununu's case is typical of those in which high-level officials have sought to exempt themselves from policies that apply to other government workers. Although government employees are instructed to rely on commercial airlines whenever possible, most top Administration officials prefer flying on the little-known fleet of more than 1,400 civilian and military aircraft that are available to the White House and most key departments and agencies. Sununu usually flies on one of 43 planes belonging to the 89th Military Air Wing, which is located at Andrews Air Force Base just outside Washington. The fleet includes the President's plane, Air Force One. By law, all the rest are available to the vice president, Cabinet members, members of Congress and "other high-ranking dignitaries." The Air Force spends an estimated $3,945 an hour to operate the 12-seat C-20 Air Force jet used by Sununu and many other top officials. Current White House policy, which was last revised during the final years of the Ronald Reagan Administration, permits the chief of staff to use one of these planes if it is necessary for him to remain in voice communication with the President during his trip. But Sununu has consistently used Air Force aircraft, even for purely personal trips. Unlike Sununu, most high-level Administration officials do not have carte blanche to travel in Air Force planes whenever they please. The Defense Department enforces an unusually rigid official pecking-order that dictates who will be given first call on these planes on any given day. Even Secretary of State James A. Baker III, who regularly uses Air Force planes for diplomatic missions, cannot always get the plane he wants, and often must take long journeys -- sometimes up to 17 hours in the air -- in windowless converted cargo planes referred to as "flying coffins." Some officials have been known to cancel trips rather than fly in these. Most Cabinet officers use the Air Force planes mainly when they are asked to represent the President at an official occasion, usually in another country. A Times survey of Cabinet members found only one -- Energy Secretary James D. Watkins -- who admitted using a military aircraft solely for convenience. "He had to get a lot of places in a short period of time with a lot of people," a Watkins aide explained. Other Options The secret aries of Justice, Transportation, Interior and some other agencies -- including the FBI -- don't have to choose solely between military aircraft and commercial travel. They have another option: their departments' own civilian aircraft that frequently are used by high-level Administration officials. Sometimes such usage runs contrary to federal policy. The General Accounting Office, an investigating agency of Congress which frequently has investigated the activities of the civilian air force, estimates that these planes are worth more than $2 billion and cost in excess of $750 million annually to operate and maintain. According to GAO officials, government agencies have been acquiring these planes steadily over the past two decades without performing the cost analysis required by OMB guidelines to show that they are needed. GAO also contends that the government planes frequently are used in cases when it would be cheaper for the official to travel by commercial airliner. Among the agencies cited by the GAO for violating government regulations on the use of civilian aircraft are the Justice Department, the FBI, the Army Corps of Engineers, the Department of Energy, the Bureau of Reclamation, the Coast Guard, the Forest Service, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and the Federal Aviation Administration. Safety Concern In 1990, for example, the GAO found that Atty. Gen. Dick Thornburgh and FBI Director Sessions were flying regularly, without exploring less-expensive options, on three FBI-owned aircraft seized from drug traffickers. The Justice Department replied that the arrangements were necessary for safety reasons. In the year since the GAO made its findings, according to Rep. Wise, the Justice Department still has failed to hammer out a policy that satisfies federal regulations on the use of these planes. Likewise, Transportation Secretary Samuel K. Skinner regularly flies on jets provided by the FAA and the Coast Guard -- both agencies under his department's control. A pilot himself, Skinner occasionally even takes the controls of an FAA Citation aircraft that has been put at his disposal. But he has never been cited by GAO for violating federal regulations. One Cabinet official who spurns travel in government-owned, civilian planes is Secretary of the Interior Manuel Lujan Jr. Even though the Interior Department has a huge fleet of these aircraft, he never takes trips on them because he fears it would generate bad publicity, according to press spokesman Steven Goldstein. No matter how they fly, all top officials face the same dilemma as Sununu: deciding when they must reimburse the government for trips that are partially personal or political. While Sununu reimbursed the Treasury for four of his personal trips and 24 political trips, he allowed taxpayers to pick up the tab for four skiing trips to Colorado and New Hampshire. The cases of Thornburgh and Sessions underscore how widely differing those decisions are. Between August, 1988, and July, 1989, Thornburgh reimbursed the government $1,032 for three personal trips he made with family members aboard government aircraft. But Sessions did not reimburse the government for his San Antonio jaunt until the GAO uncovered it. There is no government-wide policy dictating when the taxpayers will pay for transportation of a spouse who accompanies a public official on a trip. At the Transportation Department, Skinner's wife is allowed to fly at government expense only when her presence is "unquestionably in the interest of the federal government." In practice, all of her trips with her husband have been deemed to fall into this category. Even when an official does reimburse the government for such air travel, however, it almost never fully covers the actual cost of flying a government plane. For example, officials such as Sununu typically pay the government a rate equivalent to the cost of a commercial airline ticket plus $1. Such fees inevitably are far below the cost of operating an entire plane. Some government officials have been known to schedule their official travel so that it takes them to their home states on weekends. Such coincidences usually are considered completely legitimate. Nevertheless, it is highly unusual for the government to pay for an official to fly regularly between his home and his work, as did former TVA manager Stevens. In Stevens' case, the TVA agreed to pay for his travel as one of his conditions for employment. A retired Navy admiral with extensive service in the nuclear submarine program, he was hired to improve TVA's management at a time when the agency faced a crisis in its nuclear power program. After completing an investigation of Stevens' case in September, 1989, the GAO concluded that he was probably liable for federal income taxes on the fair market value of the flights. Even though Stevens' case was highly unusual, it is not unheard of for federal officials to charter airplanes, as the TVA did in his case. Not long ago, in fact, Secretary of Health and Human Services Louis W. Sullivan chartered a small plane when he needed to fly from Pittsburgh to Hampton, Va., in a hurry. There is no way to tell how many top government officials accept free flights on corporate jets, as Mosbacher does -- partly because there currently are no firm requirements that federal officials routinely disclose their travel itineraries. At the Commerce Department, officials insist that Mosbacher does not accept rides on corporate jets unless he is certain that the company involved has no pending business before department officials. Mosbacher's spokesman, Gary Foster, says such flights usually are accepted in cases where Mosbacher is scheduled to speak to employees of the company. In calling for reform of the current system for air travel by top executive branch officials, Wise argues that the officials should be required to disclose all travel on government aircraft, as members of Congress now must do. Meat Inspection Act. Enacted in 1907, that law prohibits officials with responsibility for overseeing meat inspections from accepting any gratuity such as travel accommodations or sports tickets. In addition to Rominger, an Espy deputy, and Harkin, who heads the Overseas Private Investment Corp., other potential candidates to replace Espy include Rep. Kika de la Garza (D-Tex.), chairman of the House Agriculture Committee; Rep. Jill Long (D-Ind.), Rep. Dan Glickman (D-Kan.) and Rep. Mike Synar (D-Okla.), who recently lost renomination. Long and Harkin were passed over for the job in January, 1993. Rominger, a former California farmer, is said to be under consideration because of California's political importance to Clinton. De la Garza, if chosen, would be the first Latino agriculture secretary. As for Cisneros, sources said he has told White House officials, "if push comes to shove, he's not going to resist" efforts to persuade him to resign. The Justice Department initiated an investigation recently after Linda Medlar, his former woman friend, released tapes of telephone conversations in which he suggested that he had misled the FBI about the nature of the financial payments when agents investigated his background before his nomination in early 1993. ESPY-DOUGLAS ETHICS PROBE A CLOUD OVER DUAL SUCCESSES POLITICS: OLD SCHOOL PALS FANTASIZED ABOUT POWER -- AND ACHIEVED IT. NOW THEY'RE UNDER FIRE IN AN ERA OF SENSITIVITY.

By ALAN C. MILLER and SARA FRITZ, TIME

STAFF WRITERS As schoolmates at Howard University in the 1970s, Mike Espy and his friend Richard Douglas sometimes sat up deep into the night in their dormitory, drinking beer and fantasizing about a day when they would become powerful figures on the national scene. Two decades later, still close friends, they have succeeded beyond their wildest dreams. Espy entered politics and in 1986 became the first African American elected to Congress from Mississippi since Reconstruction. In 1993, President Clinton named him secretary of agriculture, the first black ever to hold that Cabinet post. Douglas, meantime, became the first African American to earn a doctorate in agriculture from the University of Maryland, served in the Agriculture Department under President Ronald Reagan and today is senior vice president for corporate affairs for Sun Diamond Growers of Pleasanton, Calif., a large raisin, prune, walnut, fig and hazelnut producer. It is, in some ways, a vintage Washington success story: talent, charm and energy yielding power, position and the perquisites that go with them. As their careers have soared, however, Espy and Douglas have become part of an FBI inquiry -

- the sort that is becoming all too familiar in a time of heightened sensitivity over matters of ethical conduct. The FBI is conducting a wide-ranging investigation into whether Espy may have improperly accepted gifts, favors and travel expenses from a variety of private agribusiness firms that receive funding from , and are regulated by, the Agriculture Department, including his friend Douglas and Sun Diamond. Acting on the basis of preliminary FBI findings, Atty. Gen. Janet Reno has asked a three-judge panel of the federal Circuit Court of Appeals to appoint a special prosecutor to take over the case. A decision is expected soon. Espy and Douglas deny any wrongdoing. According to Agriculture Department spokeswoman Ali Webb, Espy views Douglas only as "an old friend" who happens to work for an agricultural firm. Espy, who declined requests for an interview, contends the allegations stem from unhappiness over changes he is attempting to bring to the department. Some of the allegations -- that Espy improperly used a corporate jet, accepted free tickets to professional basketball and football games and fraternized too much with individuals who deal with the government - may seem like minor transgressions, if that. But they represent one of the most important ethics issues in present-day Washington. At a time when even arcane and obscure programs and policy decisions can mean millions of dollars in profits or costs to a business or industry, the existence of close relationships between decision-makers and potential beneficiaries can raise concern about the objectivity and fairness of the process. The President himself helped to create the climate by promising during his campaign to "limit the influence of lobbyists" in his Administration. Government investigators are exploring allegations raised by some Agriculture Department officials, as well as others, that Douglas and Sun Diamond may have traded on their special access to Espy and, in turn, that the secretary has tried to protect a controversial federal program that funds overseas promotion of U.S. agricultural products -- including those of Sun Diamond. The program in question is the department's Marketing Promotion Program, which Douglas was instrumental in devising and Espy has supported in the face of stiff opposition from urban members of Congress and Administration budget-cutters. Over the last decade, Sun Diamond's cooperatives have benefited from more than $35 million in federal spending from the MPP. In addition, Douglas is credited by some officials with helping to persuade Espy to hire Kim Schnoor, a former Sun Diamond lobbyist, as his chief domestic adviser. And some Agriculture Department appointees have questioned the propriety of a $24,000, three-month Agriculture Department contract awarded to Douglas' longtime female companion, Patricia Kearney. Espy also has been a vocal defender of the use of methyl bromide, an ozone-depleting chemical favored as a fumigant by California's dried-fruit and nut industry. He has acknowledged his role in persuading the Environmental Protection Agency to delay the elimination of the chemical as a fumigant until 2001. Agriculture Department officials and others say investigators also are looking at a 40th birthday party for Espy that Douglas co-hosted and helped pay for at a Georgetown restaurant, a trip to Greece arranged by Douglas where the secretary addressed the International Nut Council, and numerous New York Knicks basketball games Espy apparently attended as Douglas' guest. As a Cabinet officer, Espy is prohibited from accepting "anything of value" from anyone whose business interests are in any way affected by his department, though the regulations make some exceptions for purely personal gifts from longtime friends. Douglas is known to have told investigators that he and other friends of Espy paid for the birthday party entirely from personal funds to avoid running afoul of ethics laws. He said he kicked in $500 himself and even cleared the arrangements with the Agriculture Department's ethics officer, James Michael Kelly. During the trip to Greece in May, 1993, Douglas and Espy dined together with their girlfriends and Schnoor. But their friends insist that while Douglas picked up the tab for himself and the two girlfriends, Schnoor wrote a personal check to cover the cost of dinners for Espy and herself. As for the Knicks games, Douglas reportedly told investigators that the tickets were left for the two men by Greg Anthony, a Knicks guard who Douglas claims "is like a son to me" and who idolizes Espy. Originally, the FBI investigation began in response to informati on received from the Agriculture Department's inspector general that the secretary had flown aboard a corporate jet and accepted lodging and football tickets from Tyson Foods Inc., the Arkansas-based poultry giant with ties to Clinton. The information was referred to the public integrity section of the Justice Department's criminal division, and the FBI was ordered to investigate. As the probe progressed, it broadened to include other matters, including Espy's receipt of Chicago Bulls tickets from an executive of the Quaker Oats Co. and his ties with Douglas. Douglas, who also declined a request for an on-the-record interview, has told friends that he and Sun Diamond actually have been less successful in pursuing federal aid under Espy than they were under his GOP predecessors. He has complained that Espy's prominence has created a political hornet's nest for him: Fellow Republicans view him as disloyal for aiding Espy; Democrats are jealous of his access to the secretary. Likewise, friends of the two men insist Douglas has been especially sensitive to possible conflicts posed by his relationship with Espy, and they suggest that some of the controversy springs from the unusual prominence of Espy and Douglas as two African Americans in a field dominated by whites. In addition, they say allegations involving Douglas are being fueled by the Teamsters Union, which has been involved in a three-year labor dispute at Sun Diamond. There is no question that Douglas enjoys unusual entrée to Espy and his closest advisers. Their parallel careers as advocates for agricultural interests have been intertwined for nearly a decade -- with benefits for both. "These guys are like brothers," said James Lake, a veteran Washington lobbyist who is close to Douglas and active in GOP circles and California agriculture groups. In 1986, when Espy, an attorney reared in a middle-class home in Mississippi, won a seat in Congress, he became an effective proponent for catfish farmers in his poor district and won reelection twice. Douglas, one of six children raised in Washington by a mother who cleaned houses for a living, deliberately chose to make his mark, friends say, in areas where there were few blacks: agriculture and the Republican Party. Douglas advised and contributed to Espy's historic first congressional campaign and then helped show his friend the ropes in Washington. On four occasions, Sun Diamond gave then-Rep. Espy an all-expenses-paid trip to California and a $2,000 honorarium for attending meetings and making speeches. Clinton's nomination of Espy as agriculture secretary marked a shared triumph for the longtime friends. Douglas, 46, has been portrayed by Agriculture Department officials as a frequent visitor to Espy's second-floor office and a shadow adviser to Espy, along with former California Rep. Tony Coelho, now an investment banker who handles the Sun Diamond pension portfolio. Espy, 40, acknowledges that Douglas recommended Schnoor, a former Coelho aide who has also lobbied for Sun Diamond as an employee of Lake's firm. He also admits that Douglas lobbied him formally at least three times on issues crucial to Sun Diamond. Douglas is said to be particularly sensitive about criticism within the department of the contract that the Agriculture Department's Food and Nutrition Service gave to Kearney, his longtime girlfriend, to help develop a strategic plan for improving the nutritional standards in the school meal programs. Kearney's defenders note that she was well-qualified for the assignment. She is a former chief of staff to Clayton K. Yeutter, George Bush's first agriculture secretary. She earned a degree in nutrition from Harvard University and a master's from Tufts University. Agriculture Department spokesman Neil Flieger insisted neither Espy nor Douglas helped her win the contract and she "was invaluable in helping the department" and worked two extra months without additional pay. Sandy McBride, communications manager for Sun Diamond, dismissed the close relationship between the secretary and Douglas as an accident of fate. "That they were college (friends) is a piece of past history," McBride said. "Richard has a very professional responsibility. He is very careful to keep the two things separate. . . ." Times staff writers Elizabeth Shogren, Ronald J. Ostrow and Dwight Morris contributed to this story.

TYSON GETS GOING-OVER BY MEDIA By JOE STUMPE Like other colorful figures from President Clinton's past, Springdale's Don Tyson is proving irresistible to the media. Two years after the first round of stories analyzing Tyson's relationship with then-Gov. Clinton, the focus now is on Tyson's supposed influence in the Clinton administration. Newsweek, U.S. World News & Report, The New York Times and Los Angeles Times have carried articles on Tyson, Clinton and Agriculture Secretary Mike Espy in recent weeks. U.S. News & World Report devoted five pages to the subject in its July 18 issue. Newsweek devoted two pages. Most of it is not what might be called good press. "The chicken king plays hard-boiled politics ... Another crony from the statehouse years creates problems for the president," reads Newsweek's headline. At the Springdale headquarters of the world's largest poultry producer, Tyson spokesman Archie Schaffer said the publicity is not affecting sales. But the general drift of the articles is clearly not appreciated. "We just think it is ridiculous," said Schaffer, who became known to Arkansans more than two decades ago as the young political wizard who ran the campaigns of his uncle, Dale Bumpers. "The relationship between Mr. Tyson and Mr. Clinton has been greatly exaggerated. There's absolutely no evidence of any preferential treatment." The coverage centers on Espy's treatment of the poultry industry and his receipt of Tyson favors -- a plane ride and football game ticket for which the agriculture secretary and former Mississippi congressman says he reimbursed the company. In June, Department of Justice investigators confirmed they were looking into whether Espy broke the law by accepting a plane ride, meals and two tickets to a Dallas Cowboys playoff game. Congressional investigators reportedly also are probing whether Espy helped Tyson and other U.S. poultry producers in a dispute blocking their products from reaching Puerto Rico. Spokesmen for Espy and Tyson deny wrongdoing. The intervention by Espy in Puerto Rico first occurred in January 1993. Inspectors in the U.S. commonwealth were refusing to let chickens from the mainland onto the island. Espy convinced Puerto Rico's governor to resolve the matter. Schaffer said officials of the National Broiler Council, of which Tyson Foods is a member, brought their concerns to Espy. He said previous agriculture secretaries had taken similar actions. "It's a problem that has been around for at least 10 or 12 or 15 years," Schaffer said. "Mike Espy was only the latest in a long line of agriculture secretaries who intervened on behalf of the U.S. poultry industry. No one at Tyson Foods had any contact with Espy on that." Newsweek reported Tyson Foods "had the most at stake" in the dispute and noted that the company's political-action committee gave $ 2,000 to the unsuccessful congressional campaign of Espy's brother a short time later. Schaffer said the PAC contributed money because the company's Cleveland, Miss., plant is in the Delta congressional district in which Espy's brother was a candidate. In May 1993, Espy gave a speech to the Arkansas Poultry Federation, spent the night at a Tyson management center and flew back to Washington aboard a Tyson corporate jet. In January, Espy and a companion watched a Dallas playoff game against the New York Giants in Tyson's luxury box at Texas Stadium in Irving, Texas. The FBI has investigated whether Espy's actions violated the 1907 Meat Inspection Act, which prohibits government officials from accepting "a thing of value" from companies they regulate. Espy isn't commenting on the investigation, but aides have said he reimbursed Tyson. The New York Times reported that federal investigators were close to concluding that Espy committed no serious wrongdoing. But the newspaper said Attorney General Janet Reno now is likely to ask for an independent counsel to examine the case and thus avoid criticism of a cover-up. The president recently signed a bill reinstating the independent counsel law. The most recent knock against Espy came with the release last week of proposed new inspection guidelines for the poultry industry. A former Department of Agriculture official accused Espy of delaying tougher standards for the industry earlier this year. When the regulations were released, nonprofit consumer groups expressed disappointment that they weren't tougher. Tom Devine of the Government Accountability Project said Tyson Foods "wi

Il have hit the jackpot" if the rules are adopted. Carol Tucker Foreman of the Safe Food Coalition called them a "modest step forward, not a major improvement in public health protection." But Foreman, an assistant agriculture secretary in the Carter administration and the sister of Gov. Jim Guy Tucker, doesn't see a conspiracy. "I don't tie Tyson and Clinton and the USDA and these regulations together," Foreman said. "That's something the media, in this part of the country at least, seem to be intent on doing. "My objection to the regulations is that the Department of Agriculture portrays them as a massive change when, in fact, it's a very modest change." Providing background for the flurry of stories is the relationship between Clinton and Tyson, which dates back to the 1970s. Tyson, members of his family and company executives have contributed thousands of dollars to Clinton's gubernatorial and presidential campaigns. Clinton and his wife, first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, used Tyson planes for free transportation on at least nine occasions, including one personal trip. The company's general counsel, James Blair, helped Hillary Clinton make almost $ 100,000 in the commodities market in the late 1970s. Blair was an outside counsel who represented the company at the time. Under Clinton, the state gave Tyson Foods $ 7.8 million in tax credits approved by the Legislature. Nonetheless, recent stories suggest a wariness by Clinton toward Tyson. The Los Angeles Times and Newsweek quote a former member of Clinton's Arkansas State Police security detail, Larry Patterson, as saying Clinton warned him of a "dark side" to Tyson. In Springfield, that's just one of the irritants Schaffer is dealing with these days. "That suggestion -- that there is a dark side to Don Tyson and that if Don Tyson ever does something for someone, he expects them to do something in return -- is just nonsense," Schaffer said. "I could give you hundreds or thousands of people Don Tyson has done things for that were not even in a position to do anything for him."

Los Angeles Times, 07/01/91:

FIRMS USE JETS WHEN THEY COURT OFFICIALS IN WASHINGTON

POLITICS: SWIFT TRAVEL IS A CURRENCY MORE VALUABLE THAN CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS AMONG THOSE SEEKING INFLUENCE. By SARA FRITZ, TIMES STAFF WRITER

As the John H. Sununu travel flap clearly demonstrates, American corporations seeking influence in Washington increasingly are using a currency even more valuable than campaign contributions: the corporate jet. Like White House Chief of Staff Sununu, a number of high-ranking Bush Administration officials and members of Congress often rely on corporate aircraft to ferry them around the country for personal, political or official purposes. They include Commerce Secretary Robert A. Mosbacher, Transportation Secretary Samuel K. Skinner, Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole (R-Kan.), Sen. Phil Gramm (R-Tex.), House Majority Leader Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) and Rep. Vic Fazio (D-Sacramento), among many others.

Likewise, the national Democratic and Republican party organizations rely heavily on corporate jets, usually to transport members of Congress or top Administration officials to fund-raisers around the country. The extensive use of private aircraft underscores the growing dependence of top public officials on the largess of well-heeled constituents and helps explain the resistance to proposed reforms. Sununu may be the most visible example but he is by no means alone. On May 10, for example, a group of Democratic congressmen led by Fazio used three corporate jets provided by the U.S. Tobacco Co., Philip Morris Inc. and the American Family Life Assurance Co. to fly to New York City for a fund-raiser sponsored by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. And a month earlier, Gramm, who chairs the National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee, used a plane provided by Hobbs Bonded Fiber Co. of Texas to make a 10-stop swing through the South to recruit GOP candidates to run in the 1992 election. Publicly, neither the politicians nor the companies have much to say about this practice. Privately, however, the politicians acknowledge that it enables them to avoid the time-consuming hassles of flying on commercial airliners and company executives.

tives suggest that it gives them a political advantage that mere campaign contributions cannot buy. Indeed, riding on corporate jets has become so popular and so widespread among politicians that Common Cause, the citizens lobby, and other reform groups are currently mounting a new campaign to close the legal loopholes that have allowed this practice to flourish. What disturbs reformers such as Common Cause President Fred Wertheimer is that many corporations never receive any compensation for the flights they provide to politicians and, even when they are reimbursed, the payments rarely cover actual cost. Under federal law, politicians seldom have to pay more than first-class fare for a ride on a corporate jet, even though the true cost of the flight far exceeds that amount. In Wertheimer's view, this constitutes an unreported, under-the-table corporate contribution to the politician who flies on the plane. "There is no justification for these guys getting these planes for anything less than charter rates," he said. "The difference between first-class fare and the actual value of the flight on a corporate jet is a gift." Sununu's trips vividly demonstrate that point. When Sununu flew to a Republican Governors Assn. dinner in Chicago on June 11 aboard a corporate jet provided by Stuart A. Bernstein, a Washington, D.C., developer, the governors' group paid Bernstein $1,888, or less than half of the flight's actual cost of $3,986. Bernstein paid the remainder and considered it an in-kind contribution to the GOP. Among top Administration officials, in fact, Sununu's use of corporate aircraft could be considered downright modest compared to that of Commerce Secretary Mosbacher, who has made more than 30 flights aboard corporate jets since he came into office in January, 1990. Sununu has flown on corporate jets five times since his use of military aircraft was restricted last May 9. Private aircraft used by Mosbacher, who was President Bush's chief fund-raiser in 1989, include jets owned by Pepsico, Northern Telecom, Transco, Philip Morris, Enron, Sun, Arco, Laredo National Bank and Ameritech. Not coincidentally, many of the executives who have supplied him with airplanes are members of Team 100, an elite Republican group whose members each contributed $100,000 to Bush's campaign. Marcy Robinson, Mosbacher's spokesperson, said there is no conflict of interest when her boss hitches rides on these planes because his job is to promote American business, not to regulate it. Although Mosbacher is clearly the leading user of corporate flights in the Cabinet, Transportation Secretary Skinner and Energy Secretary James D. Watkins also have acknowledged having done the same on occasion. Most other Cabinet members have said that they avoid using corporate planes because it creates an appearance of impropriety. Last October, Watkins flew to a fund-raiser in the Northwest on a plane provided by the Bonneville Power Administration. Skinner flew back to Washington on a jet owned by Amoco early last year after a private golf outing in Augusta, Ga., and a few months later he let Smithfield Foods Inc. fly him to a fund-raiser in Williamsburg, Va. Under the law governing such trips, which was liberalized by Congress in 1989 at Bush's request, corporations need not be reimbursed for flying Administration officials to nonpolitical events. None of the companies that provided jets for Mosbacher's nonpolitical trips have received reimbursement. Skinner's aides said that Amoco was repaid $278 for his flight from Augusta to Washington. For political trips, federal election law states that companies providing corporate jets to politicians should be reimbursed the equivalent to first-class fare. After Watkins' political trip to the Northwest, for example, Bonneville Power received a check for $1,141.13. But some of these officials have found a way to skirt the federal reimbursement requirement for political trips -- they invoke state laws, which generally do not require reimbursement. When Sununu flew to Maine for a GOP fund-raiser on a plane owned by Fiber Materials Inc. on June 7, the company received no reimbursement. Instead, company president Maurice Subilia Jr. said he was credited with making a $2,825 in-kind contribution to the Maine Republican Party. Likewise, when Skinner flew to Williamsburg, Smithfield Foods Co. was not reimbursed. Instead, according to Joe Elton, executive director of the Virginia Republican Party, company executives received two free tickets worth a total of $1,000 that permitted them to attend the fund-raiser where Skinner spoke. Among members of Congress, Dole appears to be t

Subject: Greenbriar on Friday??

This evening the Judge indicated he might be able to do this if he can go down on Friday morning and maybe return w/ POTUS on Friday right after the lunch speech.

If for some reason it doesn't work we can still explore the option of Tim going down.

Can you have the coordinator of this event call me tomorrow so we can try to work this out? I need some info on airport, drive time/ground transpo, etc.

Brett - heads up that you may need to starting putting some talking points together for this speech.

Thanks!

Do you need my assistance to set this up (he wants the meeting on Friday) or will you be calling them back to take care of it?

Also - they Judge wants to drop in to say hello while you guys are meeting. Please let me know when this will be so I can schedule it.

The second round of the moot court today went pretty well. According to the people who were there yesterday, today was a vast improvement, and Susan Rudy incorporated a lot of the comments made yesterday. Everyone now feels relatively comfortable with the argument.

I agree that this tone is far better -- factually I would still have a few changes because we may even be going too far to say inaccurate info was provided -- we may be better in a "misunderstanding" context or something like that -- I'd like to work with this version and offer a few changes.

I thought the draft letter seemed a little too apologetic and got into extraneous issues. Attached is a shorter re-draft for you to consider as you see fit.

Tim asked me to respond to you on this. As a matter of law, EOP officials who do not work set hours (in other words, non-career EOP officials) are explicitly authorized to "organize" fundraisers and engage in other political activity, even while on the job, and they also can speak at fundraisers. They cannot, however, directly solicit or receive contributions, host fundraisers, or use their official titles in connection with political activity. Note that it can be difficult, of course, to organize a fundraiser (allowed) without personally soliciting funds (not allowed), and I have talked to Jocelyn about some additional prudential issues beyond the law.

It obviously doesn't change the law, but it does mean that Walker's arguments will be presented in their best possible light. I hope DOJ is being similarly far-sighted and is loading its team up from the get-go with top appellate experts. Carter's hiring clearly reflects that Walker understands this is a deeply law-intensive issue. The research and argumentation we can expect will be top-quality.

Bush expected to fill vacancies
U.S. attorney, judge positions stand empty
By Brett Lieberman
Of Our Washington Bureau
WASHINGTON -- After months of delay, the Bush administration may be close to filling midstate judicial and U.S. attorney vacancies that have languished, even though candidates have been lined up for the posts. Congressional, legal and law enforcement officials said they expect President Bush to nominate Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board Chairman John E. Jones III and Harrisburg attorney Christopher C. "Kit" Conner as district court judges.

Lycoming County District Attorney Thomas Marino is expected to be nominated to be U.S. attorney in the Middle District, and Mike Regan, a deputy U.S. marshal and head of the United States Marshals Service Dauphin County Fugitive Task Force, is expected to be tapped to be U.S. marshal. The names of the four men have circulated in political, legal and law enforcement circles for weeks, though there has been little action from the White House. But political insiders said there could be movement within 45 days.
"I think it's very close," said one GOP insider. "We're just waiting for the White House to get moving," said a congressional source.
Though Bush is on par or ahead of the first-year nominating paces of former presidents Clinton, Bush, Reagan and Carter, congressional aides said the delays are caused by the White House.

REV_00139549

U.S. Sens. Arlen Specter and Rick Santorum, both R-Pa., have pressed White House officials to move faster.

Last week, Bush announced six judicial nominations in the eastern and western districts, where there are eight vacancies that extend back as far as 1994. Nationally, 99 judicial vacancies remain. The U.S. attorneys in the eastern and western districts had been selected.

Jones and Conner would fill vacancies created when Judges Sylvia H. Rambo and James F. McClure Jr. took senior status last April.

Among the unanswered questions is where each judge would sit. Rambo sits in Harrisburg, while McClure's office is in Williamsport. Jones lives in Schuylkill County but commutes to Harrisburg for LCB work, and Conner lives in Mechanicsburg.

Jones, a Pottsville attorney who ran unsuccessful campaigns for Schuylkill County judge and Congress, was former Gov. Tom Ridge's pick to fill one of the two Middle District judicial vacancies, but Santorum has also taken up his cause.

Jones was an early supporter of Ridge and Santorum, and donated to other Republican candidates, including President Bush. Jones and his wife, Beth, have contributed $14,357 since 1989 to GOP candidates. They also gave at least $8,975 to Ridge's campaigns since 1993.

Conner, a Harrisburg native and vice president of the Pennsylvania Bar Association, has contributed at least $10,450 to GOP candidates since 1990.

Conner coordinates the Mette, Evans & Woodside firm's corporate and commercial litigation practice. He has been active in judicial reform efforts, co-authoring a law review article, "Partisan Elections: The Albatross of Pennsylvania's Appellate Judiciary."

He is due to become president of the state bar association next year.

One oft-cited reason for the nomination delay is that FBI resources have been diverted since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. But several political and legal insiders said the FBI background checks and interviews on the candidates were completed weeks, and in some cases months ago.

All four candidates said they interviewed for the respective positions, but they had heard little in recent weeks.

"If they want me, I still am more than anxious," said Marino, adding, "I'm not handing in any resignations. I'm not giving up any jobs."

White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said the administration is working quickly to fill vacancies but would not discuss a timeline.

Jan 28 2002 12:00AM By the Editorial Board of the Union-Bulletin
The power to appoint federal judges is clearly vested in the president. Sens. Patty Murray and Maria Cantwell, both Democrats, are irate over President Bush's selection of Ronald Leighton to be a federal district judge for Western Washington. The senators believe Bush, a Republican, should have made the selection through a ``bipartisan'' process. Funny, we heard the same sort of rant from former Sen. Slade Gorton, a Republican, when President Clinton, a Democrat, was in office. Yet, Murray wasn't too riled about the issue during the Clinton years. Murray's and Cantwell's concerns ring as hollow today as Gorton's did a few years ago. The power to appoint federal judges is clearly vested with the president. The Senate's role in the process is equally clear - it looks at nominees' qualifications to determine if they are fit for the post. However, it is custom that the president consult with the senators from the state where the federal judge will be presiding. Not surprisingly, the president tends to take more seriously the wishes of senators of his own political party. Murray and Cantwell, both seasoned political veterans, should understand that reality. Yet, the pair have promised (or is that threatened?) to block Leighton's nomination unless the White House uses a bipartisan commission to make federal judicial appointments. The tirade is akin to a kid throwing a tantrum at a sandlot baseball game when he vows to take his ball and go home if he doesn't get to play shortstop. The Bush administration is on high ground here. Perhaps, from a standpoint of political expediency, the administration should have catered more to Murray and Cantwell. After all, the Democrats do control the Senate. Nevertheless, the White House has no reason to apologize. Bush asked Rep. Jennifer Dunn, R-Wash., to head a selection committee. Dunn apparently asked Murray and Cantwell to appoint people to the committee, but they declined because the senators did not want to be obligated to support the commission's final four candidates. Ultimately, we would like to see a truly bipartisan process used to select federal judges. But we are also pragmatists. This president, like all presidents, is going to take ideology and politics into account when making appointments.

Murray and Cantwell had an opportunity to be involved - to some degree - in the selection process. Instead, they opted to play politics.

The power to appoint federal judges is clearly vested in the president.

Sens. Patty Murray and Maria Cantwell, both Democrats, are irate over President Bush's selection of Ronald Leighton to be a federal district judge for Western Washington. The senators believe Bush, a Republican, should have made the selection through a "bipartisan" process.

Funny, we heard the same sort of rant from former Sen. Slade Gorton, a Republican, when President Clinton, a Democrat, was in office. Yet, Murray wasn't too riled about the issue during the Clinton years.

Murray's and Cantwell's concerns ring as hollow to day as Gorton's did a few years ago.

The power to appoint federal judges is clearly vested with the president. The Senate's role in the process is equally clear - it looks at nominees' qualifications to determine if they are fit for the post.

However, it is custom that the president consult with the senators from the state where the federal judge will be presiding. Not surprisingly, the president tends to take more seriously the wishes of senators of his own political party.

I suggest we have a strategy meeting on this -- maybe later this afternoon??? There's not a lot to work with here from a press standpoint, and we are going to raise the profile on this.....

hi. for the time being, let's hold on saying anything on or off the record about the committee's activities pulling mike chertoff away from the terrorism investigation. we want mike to go and testify at the hearing next week. when i conveyed that to wilson yesterday on behalf of the department he mentioned that he'd seen quotes to this effect. (they're considering the request. it will be a fight if they decide to resist it.) thanks.

Bush names Jim Towey (spelling is from the press office) to head faith-based initiatives program

This was a Roosevelt Room event, Bush spoke with the large portrait of Teddy Roosevelt astride a horse hanging above the white mantle behind Bush.

REV_00139589

Wearing a dark blue suit, white tie and pale green tie, Bush called on Towey to lead one of ''the great causes'' of the times, ''to rally the armies of compassion'' to help address the nation's problems. (see transcript for remarks).

We were told that the press office was considering putting out a list of some of the people invited, and the pool indicated we would all be most appreciative. The pool was told that invitees included the Cardinal of Philadelphia, the president of United Way, a prominent Imman from Virginia, the head of the Salvation Army and a leader from the Southern Baptists Convention.

Towey made remarks ''I'm deeply grateful to God, and to you, sir,'' he said, nodding to Bush as Bush stood to Towey's right.

Bush appeared to be enthused both by and about the event. Afterwards he greeted the visitors, many of whom he clearly knew.

''How's the big boy doing,'' Bush asked one man.

''He's in seminary,'' came the reply.

''He's go'n be one big preacher,'' Bush observed.

Subject: POOL REPORT #2, 02/01/02

Bush names Jim Towey (spelling is from the press office) to head faith-based initiatives program

This was a Roosevelt Room event, Bush spoke with the large portrait of Teddy Roosevelt astride a horse hanging above the white mantle behind Bush.

Wearing a dark blue suit, white tie and pale green tie, Bush called on Towey to lead one of ''the great causes'' of the times, ''to rally the armies of compassion'' to help address the nation's problems. (see transcript for remarks).

We were told that the press office was considering putting out a list of some of the people invited, and the pool indicated we would all be most appreciative. The pool was told that invitees included the Cardinal of Philadelphia, the president of United Way, a prominent Imman from Virginia, the head of the Salvation Army and a leader from the Southern Baptists Convention.

Towey made remarks ''I'm deeply grateful to God, and to you, sir,'' he said, nodding to Bush as Bush stood to Towey's right.

Bush appeared to be enthused both by and about the event. Afterwards he greeted the visitors, many of whom he clearly knew.

"How's the big boy doing," Bush asked one man.

"He's in seminary," came the reply.

The Wall Street Journal, February 04, 2002

WASHINGTON -- Kenneth Lay, the beleaguered former chairman of Enron Corp., and two other former top company executives told lawmakers they won't testify this week, as Congress begins a weeklong series of hearings probing the company's collapse.

In a letter sent late Sunday to the Senate Commerce Committee, where Mr. Lay was scheduled to appear Monday, his lawyer, Earl Silbert, said the atmosphere surrounding the hearing had become "prosecutorial." (Read the letter) Following receipt of the letter, the committee's chairman, Sen. Ernest Hollings (D., S.C.), canceled the hearing, saying that the panel won't proceed without Mr. Lay.

See complete coverage of the Enron saga.

The letter followed an appearance by Sen. Byron Dorgan, a senior member of the Commerce Committee, on NBC's "Meet the Press," in which the North Dakota Democrat voiced sharp concerns about the company. "Once you start peeling away the layers of this onion, it gets pretty ugly," Mr. Dorgan said. On the same NBC news show, Rep. W.J. "Billy" Tauzin (R., La.) said investigators for the House Commerce Committee had found what may "end up being securities fraud."

Mr. Silbert said Mr. Lay had intended to testify until it became clear from the Sunday news shows that "judgments have been reached and the tenor of the hearing will be prosecutorial."

Mr. Lay has stayed out of the public eye since the company's spectacular collapse, and Mr. Silbert wrote that his client's silence amid public allegations of misconduct has been "construed as acquiescence" by some. "They are wrong," Mr. Silbert wrote. "Mr. Lay firmly rejects any allegations that he engaged in wrongful or criminal conduct."

Mr. Silbert also wrote Ohio Rep. Michael Oxley, chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, canceling Mr. Lay's scheduled appearance before that committee Tuesday.

Even before the Sunday shows, it was clear Mr. Lay would face stiff questioning from lawmakers on issues ranging from the controversial web of partnerships that let Enron hide debt, to his handling of whistle-blowers who raised concerns inside the company.

Robert Bennett, Enron's outside counsel, said the company is cooperating with Congress, but he "understands" the concerns raised by Mr. Silbert. "It was unfortunate," Mr. Bennett said. "Mr. Lay was going to testify."

Mr. Lay's expected testimony had been the centerpiece of several congressional hearings this week probing Enron's collapse. Before Mr. Lay backed out of his appearance, the company's former chief financial officer, who organized many of the questionable off-balance-sheet deals that led to Enron's collapse, had indicated he wouldn't cooperate with the congressional probe.

Former Enron CFO Andrew Fastow and an aide, Michael Kopper, plan to invoke their Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination when called to appear before the House Energy and Commerce Committee Thursday, Mr.

Tauzin, the committee's chairman, said on Meet the Press.

A spokesman for Mr. Fastow declined to comment on whether he will appear this week, and a lawyer for Mr. Kopper didn't return calls. However, a spokesperson for Jeffrey Skilling, Enron's former chief executive, said he intends to appear before Congress and will testify freely.

With his deep personal and political ties to the White House, Mr. Lay's role in Enron's collapse underscores how the matter has become a political liability for President Bush.

On Friday, the Justice Department asked the White House to preserve any Enron-related documents, drawing the administration directly into the probe.

Despite heavy financial support by Enron to Bush campaigns, however, the Justice Department's demand doesn't suggest that it is focusing on possible influence-peddling. Instead, the letter to White House Counsel Alberto Gonzales hints that the focus may be on whether company executives took actions or made private statements about Enron's condition that were at odds with their public statements -- a signal the criminal investigation may be focusing on building a case alleging securities fraud.

"We believe that documents in the possession of the White House, its staff and employees may contain information relevant to our investigation into the financial condition of Enron and statements made by Enron employees and agents relating to its financial condition and business interests," the letter to Mr. Gonzales said. The Commerce, Energy and Treasury departments were also ordered to retain documents.

The department's demand also could raise pressure on the White House to relent in a showdown with Congress over access to White House records. Lawmakers are seeking notes of meetings between Vice President Dick Cheney and Enron executives and other energy-industry officials as a new national energy policy was being drafted. Environmentalists complained that it favored industry solutions, including the kind of changes advocated by Enron, rather than conservation.

Several congressional hearings this week will air aspects of Enron's failure, providing what lawmakers hope will be a detailed accounting of events that led to the firm's bankruptcy. Several current and former Enron executives have been called to appear Thursday before the Energy and Commerce Committee. Among these are Richard Causey, Enron's chief accounting officer, and Richard Buy, the company's chief risk officer. Calls to lawyers for Messrs. Causey and Buy weren't returned. On NBC, the committee's chairman, Mr. Tauzin, said committee investigators are finding evidence of "fraudulent, phony" accounting practices.

The House Financial Services Committee and the Energy and Commerce Committee this week also will hear from William Powers Jr., the University of Texas law-school dean and an Enron director. Mr. Powers leads a special, board-appointed team investigating possible malfeasance at the company. A report on his findings, released over the weekend, raises serious questions about the ethics and judgment of executives who created the maze of partnerships that allowed Enron to report strong profits while sweeping debt off its balance sheet.

Mr. Tauzin said the Powers report is "a good first step," but some lawmakers question whether Mr. Powers is too close to the company to provide objective analysis. Rep. John Dingell (D., Mich.), the Tauzin panel's senior Democrat, is promising to test the report's "bona fides." The Justice Department's request was sent by Richard Wray, a top aide to Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson. Mr. Thompson is overseeing the investigation; the attorney general, John Ashcroft, recused himself last month because he had accepted campaign contributions from Enron when running for re-election to the Senate from Missouri in 2000.

The department asked that the White House retain "all documents, electronic records and correspondence, computer records and storage devices ... which relate in any way to Enron's financial condition and/or business interests."

The department's request covers the period from Jan. 1, 1999, when Bill Clinton was president, and all of the Bush administration. A White House spokeswoman said officials acted immediately Friday night to comply with the request.

I just want to give you all a heads up that Federal Programs should soon have a draft motion for reconsideration in the Waxman case. We have a short deadline -- I understand that we need to have this finalized by 1:00 tomorrow. I am going to be out of the office soon for a meeting, so Shannen will circulate the draft. Please cc him on any comments.

A House bill now under consideration requires disclosure of the donors and amounts of donations to a Presidential Library Foundation. In the OMB clearance process, I have expressed no objection to this bill on behalf of our Office, but I wanted to flag the issue with you in the event you may have any concerns. (Note that under the statute, the Archivist has the responsibility to raise the necessary money for Presidential Libraries.)

The Dept. of Education has asked me to swear-in the President's Advisory

At present, I don't think I am authorized but, I understand that the President may authorize others to administer the oath. If that is correct, I request that I be authorized.

Subject: Contact in Financial Management?

Brett -- Thanks your quick help on this. One question -- WHO in Financial Management is the go-to person for doing these financial calculations -- for the percentage, or allocation, of the political vs. the official portion of these travel expenses? We're hearing rumors that some people think YOU do the math. Pls. point us in the right direction. Thanks -- McNally

Brad -

Patrick said I should contact you. NEC has a new person joining our staff and he will be dealing with tort reform and anti-trust issues. We are trying to put together a briefing book to help bring him up to speed. If you have any background papers, decisions memos, etc. I'd love if you would send me a copy so i can share them with him.

Also, I know there was a Working Group on Competition hosted by Judge Gonzalez in October, were there any papers distributed for that, or were any papers produced because of it.

Thanks so much for your help,

we are, collectively. I was thinking in the neighborhood of 6:30 p.m.
Ideally, we can do a conference call so that we can do this from our respective keep it brief. DOJ, do you have the capacity to set this up by e-mailing us the

There is some resistance from the line attorneys to a couple of the arguments being raised in comments today from Doug Letter and Greg Katsas, seconded by Brett. I'd like to have a meeting this afternoon, where we can reach a consensus, or at least impose one if necessary. Is everyone available -- either at 1 pm or 4:30?

Brad -

Patrick said I should contact you. NEC has a new person joining our staff and he will be dealing with tort reform and anti-trust issues. We are trying to put together a briefing book to help bring him up to speed. If you have any background papers, decisions memos, etc. I'd love if you would send me a copy so i can share them with him.

Also, I know there was a Working Group on Competition hosted by Judge Gonzalez in October, were there any papers distributed for that, or were any papers produced because of it.

Thanks so much for your help,
Leslie

Senate Continues to Nit-Pick(ering)

Last week, I expressed my frustration that Charles Pickering, one of President Bush's highly-qualified judicial nominees, was being denied a timely Senate hearing. Considering the Judiciary Committee's record thus far, this is no surprise. For the liberal obstructionists, who are stalling this nomination, I would like to point out that Mr. Pickering has spent 11 years as a U.S. district judge with a distinguished record of service that includes putting Klansmen in jail, crafting civil rights compromises, and working to keep young African-Americans out of the criminal justice system. Join me in admonishing Sen. Spector (202-224-4254) and Sen. Dewine (202-224-2315) to support Mr. Pickering's nomination.

UNFPA: Let's Call it Quits!

As Planned Parenthood and communist China try to drum up support for continued funding, we again urge the president to "zero out" money that would be spent on forced abortions and sterilizations. We encourage you to call the White House at 202-456-1414 and tell President Bush "not one penny" for UNFPA.

Landrieu "Bans" Together with Anti-Cloning Advocates

On Tuesday, Connie Mackey, Vice President for Government Affairs, and I had the opportunity to meet with Senator Mary Landrieu (D-La.) and commend her for her decision to cosponsor the Senate ban on human cloning. Senator Landrieu's anti-cloning leadership is crucial to the debate, particularly as she lends her reputation and bipartisan ethic to the issue. We applaud the Senator for recognizing that the cloning bill transcends party lines and the abortion debate. What matters is a common commitment to scientific research that respects the dignity of human life. This development and others suggest that the pro-cloning crowd is on the defensive. They know, as we do, that the side who best frames the debate will most likely determine the outcome of the argument. Liberals are grasping for "neutral" and obtuse terminology like "somatic cell nuclear transfer" in hopes of changing the public's negative reaction to the word "cloning." In the final analysis, however, it's the basic process of cloning that disturbs the public. Regardless of semantics or terminology, cloning is still cloning. Americans must not forget that what's at stake is nothing less than the sanctity of human life.

Happy Birthday, Mr. President!

Best wishes to Ronald Reagan on his 91st birthday! May God continue to bless him and his wife Nancy as they celebrate this milestone.

Lawmakers Criticize Pending Class Action Legislation

House Judiciary Committee members opposed to class action revisions today offered a new spin on some familiar criticisms, posing their objections against the backdrop of the developing Enron scandal and its impact on consumers. Judiciary ranking member John Conyers, D-Mich., long an opponent of industry efforts to curtail what it considers "abusive" lawsuits, asserted that in the wake of the Enron debacle, "this is an appropriate time to be considering things to create more corporate responsibility, not less. Our citizens need more protection against being swindled, not less." The pending class action legislation, he added, would create more hurdles to justice for injured parties, such as the rank-and-file Enron employees who lost millions of dollars in pension funds. He likened the Enron situation to the savings and loan scandal of the 1980s. "That too was the result of reduced regulations, trimmed and cut and limited, to make it very difficult for (any real recovery for the people who were the true victims," he said.

Conyers also squared off with the witnesses for the Republican majority, dismissing the testimony of a former small businesswoman named in a number of state lawsuits as irrelevant and questioning whether the U.S. Chamber of Commerce had written her testimony. Another witness, Peter Detkin, vice president and general counsel for Intel Corp., testified to the benefit of consolidating class actions in federal court, which is a key aim of the pending bill. Asked Conyers, "Intel is (the largest [computer] chip maker on planet Earth, and here you are explaining to us how we can make class actions better?"

Further reinforcing the link to Enron, the leading witness for the Democratic minority was Arizona attorney Andrew Friedman. Friedman represents individuals who brought a class action lawsuit in state court, on the grounds they were defrauded by the Baptist Foundation of Arizona, which collapsed in 1999. The pending lawsuit charges that the religious charity, with the assistance of its outside auditor * Arthur Andersen, which also served as Enron's auditor * hid millions of dollars in losses in off-the-books transactions with sham companies controlled by BFA. "Like Enron, BFA collapsed even though the company had received an unbroken string of supposedly clean audits by its outside accountant," Friedman told the committee. The pending class action bill has a number of cosponsors, including Reps. Bob Goodlatte, R-Va., Rick Boucher, D-Va., and James Moran, D-Va., and Judiciary Chairman Sensenbrenner. Sensenbrenner has yet to articulate a plan for further action on the bill. * by Pamela Barnett

The will resume this week, maybe by tomorrow. Here are the new rules - navy pass holders only. MUST have one navy pass holder per 6 guests - no exceptions to this rule. Since fewer people will be able to give tours, you don't have to reserve a time. You MUST know the people you are showing around. You can't show people around you don't know. No tours on Monday or Tuesday. Not sure of the exact times for the other days yet.

I know we are all swamped getting ready for tomorrow's hearing, but I think it would be a good idea for us to touch base late this afternoon to see where we are, collectively. I was thinking in the neighborhood of 6:30 p.m. Ideally, we can do a conference call so that we can do this from our respective offices and keep it brief. DOJ, do you have the capacity to set this up by e-mailing us the number to call?

I don't think he needs to back-check; I have a pretty high degree of confidence in it right now. I'd love it if he'd carry the project going forward if you guys believe he has sufficient judgment to know what to include and what to leave out. If you do, let's go for it.

Thanks again. Do you think it would be possible to have three sets made of all of the tabbed documents (leaving the originals, still tabbed, in the proper place in each box), and so that each set would also bear the appropriate tabs?

Paul, unless we unexpectedly get pulled away for other duties, we will be finished reviewing documents on time. They are all yours Thursday morning. We also will be up in the room all day (and probably some of the night), if you have a busy schedule tomorrow morning and want to do a second batch before Thursday. If you just plan on coming Thursday morning, we can coordinate later today when to meet or when to pass the

I know we are all swamped getting ready for tomorrow's hearing, but I think it would be a good idea for us to touch base late this afternoon to see where we are, collectively. I was thinking in the neighborhood of 6:30 p.m. Ideally, we can do a conference call so that we can do this from our respective offices and keep it brief. DOJ, do you have the capacity to set this up by e-mailing us the number to call?

A Brave Judge's Name Besmirched (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2002

In recent days, I have been saddened and appalled to read many of the allegations that have been put forth about Judge Charles Pickering, whose nomination to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit will be the subject of a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing today. These allegations are mostly made by groups with a Washington, D.C., address and a political agenda, not by anyone with real knowledge of Mr. Pickering's long and distinguished record on civil rights.

As someone who knows Judge Pickering and is familiar with his commitment on matters of race, I could not sit by and watch these groups' attempts to destroy a good man. Let me tell you about the Charles Pickering many of us in Mississippi have known for well over 30 years.

Charles Pickering

In 1967, many locally elected prosecutors in Mississippi looked the other way when faced with allegations of violence against African-Americans and those who supported our struggle for equal treatment under the law. Mr. Pickering was a locally elected prosecutor who took the stand that year and testified in a criminal trial against the imperial wizard of the Ku Klux Klan, who was accused of firebombing a civil rights activist. Mr. Pickering later lost his bid for re-election because he dared to defy the Klan, but he gained my respect and the respect of many others as a man who stands up for what is right.

In 1976, while serving as chairman of the state Republican Party, Mr. Pickering hired its first black political staffer. Mr. Pickering didn't send this person only into the African-American community to look for votes. He felt that the Republican Party's message should be delivered by the same individual to all communities, regardless of skin color. I may not have agreed with the Republican Party's message then or even now, but I certainly admire and agree with Mr. Pickering's inclusive approach to politics.

In the 1980s, Mr. Pickering was in private practice as a lawyer, and became known as a person who took on difficult cases. One such case involved an African-American man accused of robbing at knifepoint a 16-year-old white girl while she operated a rural grocery store. Mr. Pickering believed the man was not guilty, and took on his case. Very few others in Mississippi would have believed the same thing. After two trials, the man was acquitted.

Since he was selected and confirmed to the federal bench in 1990, Judge Pickering has continued to amass a record of working to improve race relations in Mississippi and throughout the U.S. After President Clinton held a town hall meeting on race at the University of Mississippi in 1998, Mr. Pickering and Gov. William Winter led the effort to encourage Chancellor Robert Khayat to establish the Institute of Racial Reconciliation at Ole Miss.

Judge Pickering sat on the executive committee of the institute, whose goal is to promote understanding and goodwill between people of different races. Mr. Khayat also chose Mr. Pickering to serve on the institute's board of directors, not only because of his role in helping to shape its mission, but also because he has led a life which exemplifies the institute's primary objective -- eliminating racism.

As someone who has spent all my adult life fighting for equal treatment of African-Americans, I can tell you with certainty that Charles Pickering has an admirable record on civil rights issues. He has taken tough stands at tough times in the past, and the treatment he and his record are receiving at the hands of certain interest groups is shameful.

In my view, picking judges should be about finding the right person for the job, someone who respects the Constitution, instead of distorting the record of good people for political purposes. I am afraid that is what is happening to Judge Pickering.

Those in Washington and New York who criticize Judge Pickering are the same people who have always looked down on Mississippi and its people, and have done very little for our state's residents. I urge the Senate to confirm Judge Pickering.

Mr. Evers, the brother of slain civil rights leader Medgar Evers, manages a radio station in Jackson, Miss.

Please stop with the crap about the injustice to you, even if you believe it. Brett, Noel, and I have spent a lot more time there than you. Although you started going before the other newbies, you have spent a grand total of one day more out there than Rachel, Kyle, and Bradl.

Maybe we should revisit the total time served issue first suggested by Brett. Brett, Noel and I would love to have you four go there for two nights every other week for the next two months or until you catch up to us.

Restrictions on Travel to Cuba: Administration and Enforcement

Prepared Statement of

R. Richard Newcomb
Director, Office of Foreign Assets Control
United States Department of the Treasury

before the Subcommittee on Treasury and General Government Appropriations

Committee on Appropriations
United States Senate
Washington, D.C.

February 11, 2002

{PRIVATE }I. Introduction{tc \l 1 "I. Introduction"}

Chairman Dorgan, members of the subcommittee,

Thank you for the opportunity today to address issues concerning the administration and enforcement of restrictions on travel-related transactions involving Cuba. As you know, the Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control ("OFAC") is currently responsible for administering and enforcing 24 economic sanctions programs, most recently the President's September 23 Executive Order targeting persons who commit, threaten to commit, or support terrorism. To demonstrate the extent of these programmatic responsibilities, I have appended two charts that set forth the programs in alphabetical order, one referencing the relevant Executive orders and statutory this program. (Tab 6) The Miami office also investigates alleged violations of the Regulations and processes enforcement referrals from the U.S. Customs Service and the Coast Guard.

The remaining license applications are processed at OFAC's main office in Washington, DC, along with all non-travel license applications involving Cuba relating to everything from blocked estates to international corporate acquisitions. The travel-related applications include those relating to professional research and attendance at professional meetings not covered by the general license, educational exchanges not involving academic study pursuant to a degree program, participation in a public performance, clinic, workshop, athletic or other competition, or exhibition in Cuba, support for the Cuban people as provided in the CDA, humanitarian projects, activities of private foundations or research or educational institutes, and exports of medicine or medical supplies and certain telecommunications equipment or reexports of U.S.-origin agricultural commodities from a third country to Cuba. Three licensing officers are devoted full-time to processing these applications, with many other OFAC staff involved to various degrees. During calendar year 2001, OFAC's Washington, DC staff handled 1,283 license applications for travel in these various categories and the attendant telephone calls.

We endeavor to process license applications within two weeks absent the need for interagency review, and most travel-related applications fall within this category. There are many instances, however, where a given application falls short of meeting the applicable licensing criteria. Depending upon the circumstances, the licensing officer may contact the applicant to request additional information or clarification, or the situation may result in a "return-without-action" or a letter of denial. Certain applications may have been delayed by the anthrax scare, which caused the main Treasury Department mailroom to shut down for several weeks. Mail continues to be delayed for up to two months because of the decontamination process since put into place.

2. Licensing Criteria With respect to OFAC's licensing record, I believe various recent developments have given rise to unrealistic expectations on the part of the U.S. public regarding travel to Cuba. Travel for purposes of tourism or most business transactions remains strictly prohibited, yet any bookstore offers numerous volumes that portray Cuba as just another Caribbean tourist destination. The Pope's visit to Cuba in 1998, President Clinton's 1999 people-to-people initiative, the recent surge in popularity of Cuban music and culture and the Elian Gonzales case have all served to focus the American public's interest and attention on this country. It appears that a great deal of the current frustration regarding the denial of license applications involves a disconnect between the agency's and the applicant's view of what constitutes an "educational exchange" or "people-to-people contact." These "buzzwords" are often used in license applications that fail to demonstrate any eligibility in any substantive respect to the applicable licensing criteria. In the context of the policy review called for by the President on January 17, we will endeavor to further streamline these licensing criteria while at the same time promote greater transparency and understanding by the public.

Educational exchanges not involving academic study pursuant to a degree program must take place under the auspices of an organization that sponsors and organizes such programs to promote people-to-people contact. We have published explanatory guidelines on our website. (Tab 7) These guidelines provide, in part, that people-to-people contact normally entails direct interaction between U.S. and Cuban individuals not affiliated with the Cuban government, and would normally not involve meetings with Cuban government officials. OFAC also evaluates whether the U.S. participants have received a briefing or educational materials about Cuba and the Cuban people prior to the trip, and whether each traveler will be fully participating in all of the proposed people-to-people activities.

Educational exchange involving people-to-people contact does not include travel for purposes of, for example: railroad hobbyists' desire to see aging locomotives in Cuba; a U.S. city's desire to establish a sister city relationship with Cuban government officials, or a group of architects getting together to take a walking tour of Havana. Such proposed itineraries are not made more acceptable by a commitment to distribute a few bottles of aspirin, or to visit a Cuban clergyman or dissident.

Two-year licenses issued at the advent of the people-to-people initiative for such exchanges are also now coming up for renewal, and we are discovering that some activities undertaken pursuant to those licenses during the past two years may not have entirely conformed to the spirit if not the letter of the applicable licensing and regulatory criteria. This includes licensees that allowed other groups to travel to Cuba under the authority of their licensees when that particular use of the license was not contemplated in the original submission to OFAC. Accordingly, we are exercising a heightened degree of scrutiny with regard to these requests for renewals, and are incorporating reporting requirements to better ensure compliance.

Finally, there has also been confusion with respect to licensing criteria applicable to applications to permit persons to travel to Cuba in conjunction with the exportation of agricultural commodities authorized by the Department of Commerce. Consistent with the TSRA, the Regulations provide that travel and other transactions that are directly incident to the "marketing, sales negotiation, accompanied delivery, or servicing of exports that appear consistent with the export licensing policy of the Department of Commerce" may be authorized by specific license.³ This licensing criteria does not include trade missions to discuss transactions that may not currently be authorized, such as direct U.S. financing, with a view toward the eventual end of the embargo. It also does not permit individuals with no apparent nexus to this criteria to join the trip, simply out of personal interest or a familial relationship to another traveler. While there is no limitation on numbers of participants in any given group, this nexus must

³ General transportation services relating to these exports are authorized by general license. Vessels are authorized by another OFAC general license to carry goods to Cuba that are authorized for export by the Department of Commerce provided that: (1) they have not engaged in trade or purchased or provided services in Cuba within 180 days or; (2) the vessels are not otherwise carrying goods or passengers in which Cuba or a Cuban national has an interest. Vessels not qualifying for this general authorization may be specifically licensed. Financing of these exports is restricted by the TSRA to payment of cash in advance or to financing by third country financial institutions, except that such financing may be confirmed or exist between each traveler and the activity in which he or she seeks to engage. Large numbers are often an indication that it does not. We have just issued explanatory guidelines on our website to provide additional guidance to persons applying for these licenses. (Tab 8)

III. Enforcement

A. Historical Context

Prior to 1992, OFAC lacked civil penalty authority to enforce the Cuban embargo. Criminal prosecution of travel-related violations was extremely rare. U.S. Attorney to this day do not accept Cuba travel violations for criminal prosecution absent other illegal commercial or financial transactions by the traveler involving Cuba or Cuban nationals. The lack of criminal prosecutions is widely reported in the media and in almost any travel publication that discusses Cuba.

With the passage of the CDA in 1992, the Trading With the Enemy Act ("TWEA") was amended to provide that fines of up to $50,000 (now adjusted for inflation to $55,000) could be levied for violations of the Regulations. The CDA also required that the Secretary of the Treasury impose such penalties "only on the record after opportunity for an agency hearing . . . with the right to pre-hearing discovery." In February 1997, OFAC promulgated proposed regulations to govern the hearings and in March 1998 published final regulations. The regulations provide for an extensive pre-hearing phase to include significant discovery and motions. Judicial review is available once the Administrative Law Judge's civil penalty determination is made final.

No administrative review process is currently in place, despite repeated requests for funding and proposed arrangements with other agencies over the past few years to "borrow" their Administrative Law Judges. The Secretary, however, recently approved a proposal for Treasury Department funding of two Administrative Law Judges with the necessary support staff, as well as office space and an operating budget.

For many reasons, including those previously articulated, increasingly large numbers of Americans purposely flout the law and travel to Cuba purely for tourism. Interest in Cuba on the part of otherwise law-abiding Americans has also been unscrupulously exploited by certain foreign travel agencies that advertise trips to Cuba claiming that such travel is legal. OFAC has endeavored to counteract this misrepresentation by contacting these foreign companies directly and placing warnings on our website. (Tab 9)

Beyond mere tourism, certain organizations and individuals view travel to Cuba as an act of civil disobedience. Organized challenges to the embargo have taken the form of protests involving unlicensed travel transactions and the unlicensed export of goods. In one reoccurring case, an organization of ministers periodically sponsors and organizes vehicle caravans in a protest of the Cuba sanctions. Having collected donations throughout the United States for "humanitarian export to Cuba," the group crosses the U.S. border bound for Cuba, defying OFAC and the U.S. Customs service. Treasury officials attempted to meet with members of the organization in an effort to assist in lawful and orderly exportation of goods, but the group routinely refuses to apply for a license for their exports.

Nevertheless, upon having ascertained that some of the items were qualified to be exported to Cuba, OFAC sua sponte provided a letter authorizing the export of those articles for use by the group's intended recipient, the Martin Luther King Memorial Center. The articles included school supplies, clothing, bicycles (and bicycle parts), manual typewriters and other office equipment, nonprescription medications, and various common medical supplies. The export of these goods to the King Center was determined to be consistent with the CDA and current U.S. policy with respect to Cuba. The organization also attempted to cross the border with unauthorized prescription medicines and other goods requiring a license. These were seized by the Customs Service and later licensed, consistent with provisions of the CDA, and shipped to Cuba.

There are passionate constituencies on both sides of this issue, those who believe that we do not do enough to stem the flow of U.S. tourist travel to Cuba and those who believe that any regulation of travel is an infringement of constitutional rights.

B. Investigation

The majority of OFAC's enforcement actions concern individuals who engage in unauthorized travel transactions related to Cuba tourism. OFAC has worked hard to develop procedures with the Customs Service to identify unlicensed travelers returning to the U.S. from Cuba. We have endeavored to enforce these restrictions in a very evenhanded manner that is consistent with our responsibilities under the law. As returning Cuba travelers are identified by Customs agents and inspectors at ports of entry in the United States or at U.S. Customs Preclearance Facilities in Canada or the Bahamas, those travelers who do not claim a general or specific license from OFAC to engage in Cuba travel-related transactions are routinely referred to OFAC for investigation and civil penalty action.

The result is an extremely heavy workload for OFAC that requires resources that would otherwise be devoted to more complex commercial and financial cases involving Cuba and other programs.

C. Civil Penalties

When an enforcement case is referred for civil penalty consideration, the administrative record either contains evidence of a transaction(s) involving Cuba or the prepenalty notice is premised upon a rebuttable presumption that an individual traveling to Cuba necessarily engaged in transactions involving Cuba. This presumption may be rebutted by documentation establishing that the traveler was fully hosted by a Cuban or third-country national. A prepenalty notice is then issued alleging a violation(s) of the embargo, attaching a statement of Rights and Procedures. (Tab 10)

Typical penalty assessments for unauthorized travel range from $5,000 to $7,500, but the majority of cases are settled in amounts ranging from roughly $1,000 to $5,000, depending upon the circumstances. A significant number of prepenalty notice recipients, however, request administrative hearings and are awaiting the funding and selection of Administrative Law Judges.

underpinnings and the other the basic elements of each program.

(Tab 1) In the process of developing, implementing, administering, and enforcing these programs, OFAC maintains a close working relationship with numerous other federal departments and agencies to ensure that our mandate is properly implemented and effectively enforced. Among these agencies are: the State Department for foreign policy guidance in promulgating regulations and on sensitive cases; the Commerce Department on issues regarding exports; the National Security Council staff on significant policy questions and regulatory changes; the Customs Service for assistance in the many enforcement matters involving exports, imports, transportation, and travel; and the bank regulatory agencies to assure bank compliance with financial restrictions.

Of all these programs, it is the embargo against Cuba, particularly the restrictions governing transactions related to travel, that has been and remains one of the most controversial and contested programs on the books. It is not my place nor my role to address this controversy insofar as it concerns the underlying policy debate with regard to the embargo generally and travel-related transactions in particular. The President, as recently a January 17, has reasserted his commitment to the use of the embargo and travel restrictions to encourage a rapid transition to democracy in Cuba. (Tab 2)

I have appended a chart that depicts our Cuba travel enforcement case openings and referrals for civil penalty review, as well as the number of Cuba travel Prepenalty Notices issued, for the period of January 1996 through June 2001. (Tab 11) As shown, 4,535 travel cases were opened for investigation; 1,690 cases were referred for civil penalty review; and Prepenalty Notices were issued in 947 cases.

III. Conclusion

At this time, OFAC devotes approximately 11% of its budget and 7 full-time equivalent positions to the administration and enforcement of restrictions involving travel to Cuba. To the extent these restrictions were lifted or modified, those resources could be immediately reassigned to other administration priorities, particularly the President's initiative against terrorism.

As long as the current law remains unchanged, however, OFAC remains obligated to carrying out the President's mandate that enforcement of the Cuba embargo be enhanced, and continues to direct its limited resources into the administration and enforcement of the restrictions on travel-related transactions involving Cuba in a manner that is timely, fair, and consistent with the law and prior agency practice.

Thank you.

My job is to continue doing what I have done during my tenure as Director of OFAC, from one administration to another, and that is to ensure the integrity of OFAC's administrative process and rulings, whether related to licensing or civil penalties. It is worth noting that the Judicial Review Commission on Foreign Asset Control, constituted by Congress pursuant to the Foreign Narcotics Kingpin Designation Act, in its final report to Congress dated January 2001, formally concluded that, and I quote: ". . . the Director of OFAC and his staff administer the economic sanctions programs under OFAC's jurisdiction in good faith and with the utmost professionalism, particularly given the limited resources currently available to OFAC." It is my belief that we have upheld this standard with respect to the Cuba travel program. While the license application denials and the prepenalty and penalty notices we have issued under existing law are proper fodder for the debate as concerns that law, I ask that my office not be made the scapegoat of choice simply because we have the task of administering and enforcing that law. It is exactly this political process from which I have endeavored to insulate the my office to ensure the administrative integrity of its procedures and its rulings.

One final note before I turn toward OFAC's licensing regime. When I speak about travel, I refer specifically to restrictions on transactions related to travel," rather than simply to "restrictions on travel." OFAC's jurisdiction under the Trading With the Enemy Act ("TWEA") is to prohibit or regulate commercial or financial transactions, not travel per se. The licensing criteria set forth in the Cuban Assets Control Regulations, 31 CFR Part 515 (the "Regulations"), implemented under the authority of this statute, address transactions incident to travel and other transactions that are directly incident to those activities deemed consistent with U.S. foreign policy.

We enforce against transactions engaged in by persons subject to U.S. jurisdiction when those transactions are entered into without authorization. In contrast, travel to Cuba that is fully hosted by Cuban or third-country nationals, where nothing of value is provided in return, is beyond OFAC's jurisdiction. For those who believe that the legal bases for these controls are questionable or strain credibility, OFAC's jurisdiction under TWEA to regulate these classes of transactions has withstood judicial review and been confirmed by the United States Supreme Court.¹

¹ The Supreme Court upheld restrictions on travel-related transactions with Cuba in Regan v. Wald, 468 U.S. 111 (1984). The Court held that TWEA provides an adequate statutory basis for the 1982 amendment to the Regulations restricting the scope of permissible travel-related transactions with Cuba and Cuban nationals. The Court rejected the argument that such a regulation violates the right to travel guaranteed by the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution. It held that, given the traditional deference given to executive

II. Licensing

A. Historical Context

The licensing regime applicable to transactions involving Cuba travel took its present form toward the end of the last administration, with an emphasis on people-to-people contact and family reunification. This is only the most recent permutation in administration policy on the subject, however, and the current status of Cuba travel is very much a legacy of both political parties. I have appended a chronology demonstrating how often the policy has shifted with respect to Cuba travel.

(Tab 3) In 1977, for example, President Carter lifted restrictions on travel to Cuba in their entirety, such that all travel-related transactions involving Cuba were authorized under a general license. General licenses in OFAC parlance constitute blanket authorization for those transactions set forth in the general license in OFAC's regulations, and are self-executing.

judgment in the realm of foreign policy, the Fifth Amendment right to travel did not overcome the foreign policy justifications supporting the President's decision to curtail the flow of currency to Cuba by restricting financial transactions relating to travel to Cuban travel. The Court rejected the respondents' argument that a restriction on travel was inappropriate because, in their view, there was no "emergency" at the time with respect to Cuba and that the relations between Cuba and the United States were then subject to "only the "normal" tensions inherent in contemporary international affairs." 468 U.S. at 242. The Court declined to second-guess the Executive branch on this foreign policy issue. Id.

No further case-specific permission is required to engage in transactions covered by that general license. Then, in 1982, the pendulum swung the other direction, and President Reagan reimposed a prohibition on all travel-related transactions. The pre-existing general license was limited to official U.S. or foreign government travel, visits to close relatives, and travel related to journalism and professional research. Public performances, exhibitions, and similar activities were specifically licensed on a case-by-case basis.

In 1994, responding in part to Cuban policies that resulted in thousands of Cuban rafters crossing the Florida Straights, President Clinton further tightened OFAC's licensing regime to require specific licenses, or case-by-case review resulting in either denial or authorization, for all but diplomats or full-time journalists. U.S. persons seeking to visit close relatives in Cuba instantly became by far the largest category of license applications. The following year, the general license was reinstated for professional research and the first family visit during any given calendar year, but only in circumstances of "extreme humanitarian need."

Subsequent to the Pope's visit to Cuba in 1998, President Clinton announced a new policy in 1999 to promote increased people-to-people contacts in support of the Cuban people. The result of this policy shift is reflected in the existing twelve categories of activities for which travel-related and other transactions are authorized either by general or specific license. General licenses continue to apply to journalism and the first family visit per calendar year, but without a requirement that the visit take place under circumstances of extreme humanitarian need. New categories were added, most requiring case-by-case authorization, including educational exchanges, religious activities, athletic competition and public performances and exhibitions. In addition, consistent with an overall policy development applicable to most sanctions programs generally, travel and other transactions directly incident to the marketing, sales negotiation, accompanied delivery or servicing of agricultural exports to Cuba licensed for export by the Department of Commerce were authorized by specific license.

Congress has also been actively involved in the formulation of policy with regard to Cuba generally, and Cuba travel in particular. In 1992, Congress passed the Cuban Democracy Act (the "CDA"), calling for the creation of an administrative hearing process for civil penalty cases and the creation of an OFAC satellite office in Miami to assist in administering and enforcing this program. The Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity (Libertad) Act of 1996 provided that the underlying prohibitions as set forth in the Regulations shall remain in place until there is a transition to a democratically-elected government in Cuba.² Finally, in 2000, Congress passed the Trade Sanctions Reform and Export Enhancement Act (the "TSRA"), restricting the President's discretionary authority to authorize certain travel-related transactions to, from, or within Cuba. Under the TSRA, that authority, ultimately delegated to OFAC, is restricted to travel-related transactions related to activities ". . . expressly authorized in paragraphs (1) through (12) of section 515.560 of title 31, Code of Federal Regulations, or in any section referred to in any of such paragraphs (1) through (12) (as such sections were in effect on June 1, 2000)." The TSRA also expressly provided for case-by-case review of license applications for travel in support of agricultural exports - an activity referred to in paragraph (12) of section 515.560 of the Regulations -- but in so doing restricted the President's discretion to generally license such trips. "Tourist activities" were defined in the Act to encompass any activity falling outside of these twelve categories. I have appended a synopsis of these twelve categories to this testimony for ease of reference. (Tab 4) I have also appended our brochure on Cuba entitled: "What You Need to Know About the U.S. Embargo," which covers all facets of this economic sanctions program. (Tab 5)

B. Licensing

1. Administrative process OFAC processes a large number of license applications relating to the Cuba embargo, the majority of which concern travel. License applications relating to subsequent family visits, free-lance journalism, educational activities by accredited U.S. academic institutions, religious activities, informational materials and agricultural and other exports are processed by OFAC's Miami office. During calendar year 2001, the Miami office, with a current staff of five, handled 19,045 license applications for travel in these various categories, particularly family visits, handling at least as many attendant telephone calls. Another of the office's primary responsibilities is to regulate 182 entities nationwide, almost two-thirds of which are headquartered in Miami. These entities are currently licensed to: (1) provide travel and carrier services to authorized travelers; and (2) remit funds to Cuba on behalf of individuals who are subject to U.S. jurisdiction to close relatives or Cuban households in amounts authorized under the Regulations. Integral to this regulatory program is the licensing and compliance oversight of the direct charter flights to Cuba currently authorized from Miami, Los Angeles and New York to carry authorized travelers. I have appended a copy of OFAC's Circular 2001, setting forth guidelines applicable to

Today, Regina Scofield at HHS put together an excellent briefing for all of the political appointees (Schedule Cs, DAS, Assistant Secretaries, etc.). Among the topics covered at the meeting, I did a political briefing, going over the top races, latest polls, etc. Last year, I did the same thing at many of the agencies.

Because this is a political year, regular, updated information will be important and interesting. We want to discuss targets, how people can help, our plan for coordinated activities, and (most importantly) what's appropriate and legal. To that end:

1. Your general counsels will be invited to a meeting at the White House next week with White House counsel to go over ground rules. Brett Kavanaugh will be in touch with your counsels about this.
2. We will again begin our regular informational briefings at the White House. I hope that you can attend.
3. If appropriate, Matt Schlapp or I would like to do a quarterly meeting with all of your political appointees (Schedule Cs, PAS, Assistant Secretaries) to provide regular updates.
4. We are getting many inquiries from people about how they might be able to help out on campaigns. Consistent with the approval of counsel, there will be one person at the RNC who can place interested staff in campaigns. We will forward the name to you shortly.

Thanks, Kate Marinis will be in touch with your assistants to schedule these.

FYI that I called them again this morning to "check in" on this before I left town. We can say we have placed two calls to set this up and we are waiting for the senators to get back to us with a time.

Democrats Blast Bush Judicial Nominee
By Susan Jones
CNSNews.com Morning Editor
February 08, 2002

(CNSNews.com) - Republicans accuse Democrats of demonizing another one of President Bush's judicial appointees - U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering, who's been asked by President Bush to serve on the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans.

In an unusual move, the Senate Judiciary Committee asked Pickering to appear for a second confirmation hearing on Thursday. His first hearing took place in October.

At Thursday's hearing, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee accused Pickering of ethical lapses and questioned his record on civil rights and abortion.

REV_00139950

Liberal interest groups strenuously oppose the nomination of Pickering because of his conservative positions, and one Republican Senator accused his fellow Democrats of serving as the mud-flinging tools of those liberal groups.

Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, said Thursday, "I am troubled by what appears to be a national agenda by a coalition of left-wing interest groups who have spent months hunting around for an excuse to use the Pickering nomination as a way to attempt to paint the administration's nominees as extremist."

Press reports note that representatives of those liberal interest groups - including People for the American Way, the Alliance for Justice, and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People - were present at Thursday's hearing.

As Sen. Hatch indicated, the issue is larger than Pickering. Analysts say that by demonizing all of President Bush's judicial nominees as "conservative extremists," liberal groups are sharpening their claws for the real battle - the future direction of the U.S. Supreme Court.

Although there are no vacancies on the court, that could change at any time, giving President Bush the opportunity to appoint another conservative to the bench. In the meantime, Republicans accuse Democrats of foot-dragging in getting Bush's judicial nominees confirmed.

So far, the Democrat-led Senate has approved only one-third of President Bush's judicial nominees.

On Thursday, Pickering told the Judiciary Committee he was there to set the record straight: "I have a record of standing up for equal protection, respecting the rule of law and making efforts to promote racial harmony for more than four decades."

His supporters say Pickering's record speaks for itself, but they worry that liberal efforts to distort the facts will sully his "exemplary" record.

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, did not say when his panel might vote on sending Pickering's nomination to the full Senate. However, he did give committee members another week to submit additional questions to Pickering - this time in writing.

PPO and OPA are currently working on the WH Fellows Board and is looking for a friendly female judge -- it can be a current or retired judge (federal or state) -- do any of you have some people you would recommend? Names with contact information is very helpful and any bio info. is a great help. Unfortunately there is a time crunch on this one, so any ideas you have today please forward along. Thanks for any help/ideas you can provide.

There is an extra "you" in the last sentence of the letter.

In the brief, we should probably refer to "the Administration" as conducting the review, rather than the "White House".

A couple of Senate leadership staffers would like to meet privately with the 5 of us next week to discuss some ideas they have about how we might work more effectively with, and coax more discipline out of, the Senate on the judicial confirmation front. We have tentatively decided to meet in my office at 3:00 p.m. next Wednesday the 13th, for the hour just before JSC. Please let me know if this will work for you. Although this is sort of an off-the-record meeting and whether there will be any follow-up will be entirely up to us based on how we evaluate the ideas presented, my sense is that this meeting could potentially be important and helpful.

Paul:

We wanted your thoughts on the following draft letter, which should be self-explanatory. The Ose Subcommittee has sought testimony from Ms. Hair regarding Presidential gifts policy. We decided to keep the letter short and sweet.

We need to send the letter this morning if possible. Thanks.

We have less than a box of Reagan records that need NSC review before authorization for release. These are documents that were never classified, but that OLC has identified as worthy of NSC review. Can you identify someone who can do this today and tomorrow? Thanks.

I would like to add an additional query to my memo to Judge Gonzales regarding clarification of the Hatch Act (dated 2/5/02):

- Can advance staff paid by a political entity (i.e. RNC) plan and participate in official events on behalf of the President?

Thank you.

Hey Helen:

Here are responses to a few scheduling items you sent over for Counsel's office review. Let me know if this is sufficient for you.

1) Victor Garo letter of Jan. 16 re: Mr. Joseph Salvati (criminal case) - this is being sent to Brett Kavanaugh so he can draft a response. BRETT - please bcc me on the response letter so we can close the loop with Helen.

2) Letter for D. Michael Wallach on 4/26/01 re: Texas Association of Defense Counsel event in April 2002. Knowing that POTUS would not likely preach to the choir (a group of conservative lawyers from Texas) the Judge has accepted their invite to speak to them. His speech will be on Thursday, April 4th at 7pm.

3) Letter for Dr. Donal A. Cabana from Univ. of Southern Mississippi re: April 2002 banquet. The Judge doesn't know anything about this university or the program so he doesn't really have any comments. If you would like for me to send this to one of our lawyers (probably Chris Bartolomucci) for his review and comments I would be happy to. Just let me know.

Thanks!!!

The Photo Office has no idea how to handle these questions, so I bring them back to you, unfortunately:

1) On two recent trips into the field, the President met with "Grassroots Activists" and held a photo line of about 60 people each (in WV and NC, respectively). These events were not fundraisers; just a general "thank you" to activists who have worked on behalf of his agenda. The events did include, though, some donors to his 2000 campaign. I am now holding the White House Photographer's photos from those events - am i free to send them out to the people who posed with the President?

2) On actual Fundraising events (to take place shortly), the President will hold photo-lines with attendees. In those cases, the campaigns (who benefit from the fundraisers) should pay for the photographers/photos/etc., right?

Good morning Brett,

I forwarded your comment to Treasury, they didn't understand your second question. Also, they wanted to know what did you mean by your first inquiry. Please see their comment.
Let me know if your comment were mere inquiry, and not so much required changes. Thanks.

Irene:

I'm not sure I understand your 2nd sentence in your 2nd paragraph 2, below, re the reference to the evidence. It's a little too cryptic.

If that is what my folks thought, and now believe differently, why shouldn't they say it. If others have different information they can say. Also, in light of the last sentence, i.e. that credit card concerns have not been eliminated, what are we missing or saying incorrectly.

Anything more specific?

Ron

Good morning Rong,
Here is a comment from WHGC. I'm still waiting for more comments from agencies.

White House Counsel's Office has no objection. We question the reference to the evidence related to September 11 at the top of page 15. On page 21, there is a reference to "both such lessons" when there are three.

Chairman Burton plans 2 days of hearings this week on the Boston FBI matter and, particularly, the Department's role in the 1971 Cal.
prosecution of Barboza for a murder, which he allegedly committed while in the WitSec program. Harrington, Rico, and Condon testified on his behalf at sentencing to confirm threats against his life by mobsters while he was in the program.

The Committee's 2/11 letter, which is being circulated now via fax, requests a DOJ witness for each day of the hearings, but our informal information indicates that a single DOJ witness on the 2nd day, who will appear alone on the 2nd panel, will suffice. More later.

Subject: Regular Political Briefings

Today, Regina Scofield at HHS put together an excellent briefing for all of the political appointees (Schedule Cs, DAS, Assistant Secretaries, etc.). Among the topics covered at the meeting, I did a political briefing, going over the top races, latest polls, etc. Last year, I did the same thing at many of the agencies.

Because this is a political year, regular, updated information will be important and interesting. We want to discuss targets, how people can help, our plan for coordinated activities, and (most importantly) what's appropriate and legal. To that end:

1. Your general counsels will be invited to a meeting at the White House next week with White House counsel to go over ground rules. Brett Kavanaugh will be in touch with your counsels about this.
2. We will again begin our regular informational briefings at the White House. I hope that you can attend.
3. If appropriate, Matt Schlapp or I would like to do a quarterly meeting with all of your political appointees (Schedule Cs, PAS, Assistant Secretaries) to provide regular updates.
4. We are getting many inquiries from people about how they might be able to help out on campaigns. Consistent with the approval of counsel, there will be one person at the RNC who can place interested staff in campaigns. We will forward the name to you shortly.

Thanks, Kate Marinis will be in touch with your assistants to schedule

Our offices will be getting new locks. They may be able to work on our area tomorrow during the day. If this is the case I will need to obtain keys to your current locks and turn them in so we can get issued new keys. Once our area has a set time, I'll send out an e-mail so I can be sure to get your keys. Thanks.

Can you send her the Judge's memo from last year for starters -- and if they then need a follow-up I will do it.

Tom Jipping takes a look at some of the eyebrow-raising decisions made by Bill Clinton's most radical judges on the left coast in today's "Respectful Dissent" column in <www.WorldNetDaily.com> And wonders how these judges ever got to where they were in the first place.

It's a question worth asking - especially given the current tactics of Senate Democrats considering President Bush's nominees.

Getting the answers about why West Coast justice is out of whack starts with reading Tom Jipping's column. Just one click and you're in:

Subject: it's me again...

hey there! may I stop by to get the blue sheet I dropped off last night?
I've already had two emails today about this laptop...ugh.

also, (yes, it's time for me to bug you again...) any chance I could get those trip summaries by late tomorrow morning? I am leaving the office at noon tomorrow and won't be back until Wednesday. I am just trying to keep the OA folks from having a meltdown while I am away. If you can pull it off, there's a reward in it for you...more blue sheets!!!! Now there's incentive for you...

Thanks!!!

Kim

This should give you a good idea of the average costs. However, according to Jacque in FMD, expenses for trips after September 11th (eg. Orlando) have increased significantly. So, we may want to consider increasing the deposit request. I can give you an update on trip costs as soon as the bills are processed for the trip summaries you signed today.

Let me know if you need more info.

&St. John,s Reform.8 &The President has been hinting he'll sign this assault on free speech, and that made sense when his hints told Members of Congress that what they voted for might actually pass. They needed to know they didn't have a free vote. But now that this monstrosity might become law, Mr. Bush has to think about the oath he took to protect the Constitution. The easy political decision is to sign anything that hits his desk,8 but &that would also be a Constitutional abdication of the first order. In the 2000 campaign, Mr. Bush ran as a reformer, too, but by advocating very different principles than those favored by Mr. McCain or Al Gore. Mr. Bush won, yet his opponents' principles are the ones contained in the bill that has now passed the House and the Senate.8

Sprietsma v. Mercury Marine, cert granted 1/22/02

Does Federal Boat Safety Act preempt state common law claims that recreational motor boat was defectively designed because it lacked propeller guard when:
(a) act expressly provides that "[c]ompliance with this chapter or standards, regulations, or orders prescribed under this chapter does not relieve a person from liability at common law or under State law," 46 U.S.C. § 4311(g); (2) U.S. Coast Guard has never adopted any standard or regulation with respect to propeller guards; and
(3) United States has taken position that common law no-propeller-guard claims do not conflict with or otherwise frustrate any federal statutory or regulatory purpose?"

Subject: preemption case pending in Supreme Court

Sprietsma v. Mercury Marine, cert granted 1/22/02

Does Federal Boat Safety Act preempt state common law claims that recreational motor boat was defectively designed because it lacked propeller guard when:
(3) United States has taken position that common law no-propeller-guard claims do not conflict with or otherwise frustrate any federal statutory or regulatory purpose?"

Hey, you groovy Counsel gurus, the National Archives has a truck leaving Washington on Wednesday, February 20, destined for College Station. I believe that some of the items we will loan to the Archives will go on the truck. Would it be possible to have a loan agreement in place before we send some of our items on this truck?
Thank you for your help!!!

Brett:

Department and Agencies have boards and commissions that require bipartisan membership. A couple of the agencies have asked that I check their candidates political affiliation registration through the RNC so they can ensure that they a bipartisan membership. When conducting these checks for other personnel matters I use my RNC laptop to email the RNC this information after I have typed in the information on my laptop.

1. Can I run these checks for the departments and agencies?
2. If I can do this, then is it possible for me to send them the format for that these checks must be in? (They already have this information from the normal application process.) I would have them send the spread sheet to my White House Account and then I would forward the information to my RNC laptop and then send the information along to the RNC.

If you need further information please feel free to call or email me.

Thanks,
Darren

Peggy Love of EPA called requesting a memo that details the ethical guidelines when combining official and political travel for government officials.
One of EPA's regional administrators is visiting the TX regional office and also wants to attend a political fundraiser. They claimed that a memo already exists on this subject. Do you have it or is this a Moose question?

It doesn't really matter what time the "844" number says, if the Judge's clocks are different. In any event, however, I just checked the "844" number, and it said the same time that is on my watch and on the computers -- the times I go by, and which are consistent with the Judge's phone clock. So I think we all agree on the principle (don't get there early); and it may be, Brett, as simple as you needing to adjust your watch.

ok, gang, I suggest that when necessary, we call the phone number above to get the exact time; it's starting to get a little ridiculous again with the staff meeting starting earlier and earlier because a few eager-beavers get to the waiting area many, many minutes before the official 8:15 start (8:45 start this week); if anyone is that eager to start at 8:00 or 8:10, let's do that explicitly so that all have fair notice. (Note that the clocks on our computers appear to be synchronized to the correct time.)

Brett,

Peggy Love of EPA called requesting a memo that details the ethical guidelines when combining official and political travel for government officials.
One of EPA's regional administrators is visiting the TX regional office and also wants to attend a political fundraiser. They claimed that a memo already exists on this subject. Do you have it or is this a Moose question?

Brett,

The National Cattlemen's Beef Association wants to know if they can sell a video of the President's speech that he gave to their membership on the 8th in Colorado. They video was shot at the convention by their own crew and the entire trip and convention was paid for by NCBA. They would like to know if there are any legal questions that need to be addressed before the do anything.

Thanks,

Moooooo se's answer is: why not? As a legal matter, I do not think the Gov't has any proprietary rights over the use of the film. Now, if we want to put a stop to it, I would think we could (and this, I believe is Noel's area of expertise.) As a practical matter, political should be given a chance to see the video and see if we like the content. In terms of telling them to not do it, we could assert that profiteering off of the Presidential visit was not part of the bargain.

Moooooooo se's answer is: why not? As a legal matter, I do not think the Gov't has any proprietary rights over the use of the film. Now, if we want to put a stop to it, I would think we could (and this, I believe is Noel's area of expertise.) As a practical matter, political should be given a chance to see the video and see if we like the content. In terms of telling them to not do it, we could assert that profiteering off of the Presidential visit was not part of the bargain.

Expressing no views on the application in this case, the basic rule is that government employees are not allowed to use their public office for the private gain of another. While this rule arguably does not apply to the principals, we urge them to voluntarily abide by it. There are, however, certain exceptions to this rule -- in particular and on rare occasions for charities that the Bushes feel particularly strongly about and that they personally decide to support (i.e., not their staffs) by making a donation or appearing at fundraiser. It is this rule/policy that is the basis for the general rule against donating auction items to charities.

Does the President ever appear at events that are fundraisers in the sense that the organization charges more than cost for attendance? If so, that seems rather indistinguishable from this scenario. Also, why isn't the answer: "We do not approve or authorize, but we also cannot prohibit."

I just left you an email---I have to run out for a short errand, but I will leave the folder I need you to review on my chair. Feel free to use my office if you want to look it over there. Thanks again, and don't worry about the "MOU". Karen Hughes wants some of these things hand carried, and I was going to CS anyway, so I'll just add a few other things. No worries at all.

ok. NARA general counsel is supposed to confirm with us this morning. (I do not understand why you have to trek down there, but I'll leave that to you to decide.)

Thank you for your hard work on this. Unfortunately, the truck for College Station left early this morning, and we weren't able to send our treasures. So, I will be a pack camel next week and take the items to Texas. Still need the agreement, of course, so let me know if there's something I need to convey to the Library, or there's something I can do to help. Thanks again.

Hey, you groovy Counsel gurus, the National Archives has a truck leaving Washington on Wednesday, February 20, destined for College Station. I believe that some of the items we will loan to the Archives will go on the truck. Would it be possible to have a loan agreement in place before we send some of our items on this truck?
Thank you for your help!!!

Let me check with Rebecca to see if her memo was ever put in final form.
If it was, I think we should take another look at it and have a prep meeting with the Judge before the 2/28 meeting. Do you agree?

I affirmatively offered to Bart to take 2 make-up days at the end of this rotation, but I also told Bart that I would (of course) be happy to live with the windfall. I left it up to him to decide how to handle -- as he is the maestro. I am pretty happy for the moment however.

The next face-to-face Chief of Staff meeting has been scheduled for Friday, March 1 at 3pm in room 180 of the EEOB.

Brett Kavanaugh (White House Counsel's Office) and Ken Mehlman (White House Political Affairs) will be on hand to provide advice and counsel with regard to the do's and don'ts regarding your participation in politically-related activities, as well as your politically-related discussions with your respective Secretaries. We will also cover the do's and don'ts of PAS participation in politically-related activities (including the Secretary and Schedule Cs), since the rules for PASs are somewhat different than those related to you as a non-career SES. Brett is meeting tomorrow with your respective General Counsels to go over these issues.

While there will be a strong need this election year for the legal and responsible participation of political appointees in the political process, we want to make sure that we are all on the same page regarding the rules of the road given the enormous amount of public scrutiny on this Administration's political activities going forward. We would also ask that you bring your White House Liaisons with you for this meeting given they will also be involved in helping your agency's political appointees understand the rules. Cathy Hargraves of Cabinet Affairs will be contacting your assistants to confirm your attendance. Thank you.

It usually takes a week to 10 days, but DOJ is contacting the court reporter to get an expedited transcript. It may still take a few days. Brad mentioned to me that you are looking to see if you can get a transcript of yesterday's oral argument on the voucher case. If you do, can you let me have a copy or let me know how to get one?
Thanks.

Justice held hostage

EDITORIAL
February 21, 2002

IT WAS about a year ago now that President Dubya nominated Lavenski Smith--one of Arkansas' best and brightest--to fill a vacancy on the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals. We still believe what we said when the announcement was made: Lavenski Smith is the right man for the job. He understands what the law requires of our judges--scholarship, care, labor, personal responsibility, restraint, patience and the courage to make decisions that may not please everyone or even anyone.

We also said something else: "Lavenski R. Smith will offer the Senate Judiciary Committee a splendid opportunity to do the right thing." That was in May of 2001.

As of this date, the Senate Judiciary Committee hasn't even bothered to schedule a confirmation hearing, let alone do the right thing.

Why not? The record is replete with testimonials to Judge Smith. He's described--accurately--as a man of integrity, intelligence and compassion. Governors, judges, senators--all have applauded Vince Smith's nomination. The praise is bipartisan, bicameral, bi-extraordinary.

Lavenski Smith isn't alone. Although the president has nominated some 90 judges for vacancies across the country, the U.S. Senate has refused to confirm--or even reject--a majority of them. Like Arkansas' own Vince Smith, these nominees have been left in limbo while the U.S. Senate plays politics.

It wouldn't be the first time.

Back in 1997, William Rehnquist, the chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, was forced to chide the Republicans in the Senate for not confirming another president's nominations. "Whatever the size of the federal judiciary," Justice Rehnquist wrote, "the president should nominate candidates with reasonable promptness, and the Senate should act within a reasonable time to confirm or reject them."

REV_00140650

The Democrats in the Senate, who were in the minority then, agreed. Loudly. To quote Patrick Leahy, now the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee: "Those who delay or prevent the filling of these vacancies must understand that they are delaying or preventing the administration of justice. Courts cannot try cases, incarcerate the guilty or resolve civil disputes without judges."

Well said, senator. But were you listening? Now you're the one presiding over the Senate's graveyard of judicial nominations. How memory can fade, and words spoil, in the blink of a campaign year. Now that Chairman Leahy controls the Judiciary Committee, and a rascally Republican is president, Patrick Leahy seems to have forgotten his former concern about the slow wheels of justice.

By now the situation has gone from slow to nearly stopped, from embarrassment to emergency. Back in 1998, when Senator Leahy said we faced a "judicial vacancy crisis," there were 50 vacant judgeships. Today, there are nearly a hundred. And the Senate seems to have time for everything but doing its duty.

Judge Gilbert Merritt of the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals got fed up. He complained to the Judiciary Committee, noting that a fourth of the 16 seats on his court remained unoccupied. "The Court is hurting badly," he wrote, "and will not be able to keep up with its work load ... Our Court should not be treated in this fashion. The public's business should not be treated this way."

The good judge wrote that letter in March of 2000, when there were only four vacancies by his count. Now there are eight. The Sixth Circuit is working at half strength. And still the Senate fiddles.

Both of this state's U.S. senators have praised Lavenski Smith's nomination. It was Tim Hutchinson who suggested Judge Smith to the president. Blanche Lincoln hasn't objected. Though as a Democrat, she might do more. She could go to her colleagues--Chairman Patrick Leahy and the majority leader, Tom Daschle--and ask why they're holding up justice in these parts. And why they're snubbing a good man like Lavenski Smith. She might point out that holding judicial nominees hostage for political gain is just as unseemly when Democrats do it. She might even tell them that the public's business ought to come before the partisan's. Even in an election year.

Sara-we have lots of companies/PAC's etc who are jumping into this Presidential event. Do you have an opinion/preference on steering them toward being listed as a host in the program as a person or as a company?

e.g.-Do you prefer 3M Company or Jim McNerney? And is only one way acceptable?

Sara-we have lots of companies/PAC's etc who are jumping into this Presidential event. Do you have an opinion/preference on steering them toward being listed as a host in the program as a person or as a company?

e.g.-Do you prefer 3M Company or Jim McNerney? And is only one way acceptable?

If anyone has any concerns with the text of the victims rights constitutional amendment as Viet presented it to us, please let me know by the end of the day on Wednesday. As we discussed at the meeting, the Department is interested in potentially having a White House ceremony announcing the President's support for the amendment during National Crime Victims Week, which is April 21-27. Thank you.

Our records indicate that your MailBox will soon exceed 1 GB of data and your account will freeze when the limit is reached. You will then need to contact our technical staff to enable your account to receive e-mails again. In order to avoid this from happening, we request that you delete as many unneeded e-mails as soon as possible. Lotus Notes offers an "All By Size" feature which allows you to delete your largest files first and we've provided instructions on that feature below.

We also request that you empty your trash bin and make this a weekly practice. If you have any further questions, please contact your Agency's Customer Service Representative or our Help Desk at 5-7370.

Using All-By-Size:

This feature can be found within your Notes folders listing toward the bottom of the list. By clicking on this folder you will get a listing of all your messages in order of size. You can also click on the Document Preview button under View (top line on the menu) to view the contents of each document before marking it for deletion. Once you have selected - using checkmarks - the files for deletion, just click on the delete button as usual. And please make sure you have also emptied your trashcan folder since they aren't really gone until that is empty.

Thank you.

We are still waiting for guidance from Dr. Rice, who has been away with the President. I would recommend that OMB go ahead and circulate the State draft to agencies for formal views, with a notation that the FSI issue remains to be resolved and may be the discussion of an interagency meeting led by the NSC. This will at least allow us to get more formal views from DoD and Treasury, who have string equities here.

I think that josh felt strongly that state rec should not be circulated.
I recommend circulating plan b. If Dr. Rice has strong feelings about state rec. we can circulate it after she and josh discuss.

Please let's make sure that the loan agreement specifically enumerates all the items included and a return date, i.e. they are to be returned to the White House by no later than August 15, 2002. I would like to have a copy on file for the duration of the loan in case there are any questions.

Due to ever changing schedules, the Brett, Brad, Ed, and Patrick birthday lunch will be tomorrow at AV at 1:00 pm.

Please let me know who will attend, and who can drive.

Lori will be taking orders (as I have to place them in the next few hours). Probably ordering several pizzas and splitting them will be the best way to go, as they have asked us to simplify the order being that we are potentially coming in with 20+ people.

Thanks!

Allison

Right now we aren't sure if we are having JSC meeting on Wednesday b/c of a non-existant notebook.

If we do have it JSC prep will be held immediately following staff meeting (9:15 ish) so please plan on sticking around.

I'll keep you posted.

Thanks!

Subject: Birthday lunch...

Due to ever changing schedules, the Brett, Brad, Ed, and Patrick birthday lunch will be tomorrow at AV at 1:00 pm.

Please let me know who will attend, and who can drive.

Lori will be taking orders (as I have to place them in the next few hours). Probably ordering several pizzas and splitting them will be the best way to go, as they have asked us to simplify the order being that we are potentially coming in with 20+ people.

Thanks!

Allison

Subject: Birthday lunch...

Due to ever changing schedules, the Brett, Brad, Ed, and Patrick birthday lunch will be tomorrow at AV at 1:00 pm.

Please let me know who will attend, and who can drive.

Lori will be taking orders (as I have to place them in the next few hours). Probably ordering several pizzas and splitting them will be the best way to go, as they have asked us to simplify the order being that we are potentially coming in with 20+ people.

Thanks!

Allison

Insuring Against Terror Costly
Mall of America Feels Repercussions

By Jackie Spinner
Washington Post Staff Writer
Tuesday, February 26, 2002; Page E01

Large business and property owners around the country are having increasing difficulty obtaining insurance for terrorist acts, creating problems that could ripple through the economy, according to a General Accounting Office report that is to be released tomorrow.

Losing terrorism insurance could put many companies and properties in technical default of their loans and mortgages, because lenders would have no guarantee of getting paid back in the event of an attack.

One example, although not mentioned in the report, is the Mall of America in Minnesota -- the nation's largest shopping center -- which went to court to prevent the holder of its mortgage from forcing it to buy a very expensive and limited terrorism policy.

The market for terrorism insurance has dried up for large commercial policyholders since the Sept. 11 attacks, prompting insurers and business leaders to call for federal action. But Congress adjourned in December without enacting legislation that would have created a system to help pay future terrorism claims and thus provide some incentive for insurers to return to the market. Congress has not revisited the issue this year.

After the beginning of the year, the majority of reinsurance contracts expired, leaving primary insurers without their backup coverage. "The economic burden of another terrorist attack would fall increasingly on policyholders as the insurance industry sheds or limits its risks to such exposures, raising the potential for more devastating economic consequences should such an event occur," according to excerpts from the report, which were released yesterday by the House Financial Services Committee. "The potential for more severe economic impacts is increasing as the level of uninsured risk climbs." The committee plans to hold a hearing on the issue tomorrow.

Because commercial real estate drives so much of business in any community -- primarily through tax revenue and job creation -- financial experts predict the fallout from the insurance issue could spread much farther than the real estate and lending sectors.

The Mall of America's troubles stem from a dispute with GMAC Commercial Mortgage Corp. over whether its loan agreement requires terrorism insurance. Simon Property Group, an Indianapolis-based real estate investment trust that owns the Mall of America, said in a statement that the agreement does not have such a requirement.

A judge in Hennepin County District Court in Minneapolis granted Simon Property Group a temporary restraining order last week to prevent GMAC from forcing the mall to buy a separate terrorism insurance policy as a condition of its lending agreement.

In its statement, Simon said that GMAC was able to find limited terrorism coverage for the mall but that the coverage was inadequate and expensive, costing three times what Simon pays for all property insurance on the mall.

That amount would be "a commercially unreasonable sum, which will only increase the financial burden on the mall's tenants, many of whom are small business owners," the statement said.

Although GMAC would not comment specifically on the Mall of America agreement, its chairman, David E. Creamer, said yesterday that GMAC's loan contracts generally require that "all risks" be insured.

"If you as a lender or a bondholder made a loan or bought a bond, and you had a property that is fully insured and a new policy comes in without terrorism coverage, then you have a risk you didn't buy into or you didn't pay for," he said.

According to the GAO report, the Mall of America's experience is not unique. The report concluded that "large companies, businesses of any size perceived to be in or near a target location or those with some concentration of personnel or facilities are unlikely to be able to obtain a meaningful level of terrorism coverage at an economically viable price."

Deborah B. Beck, executive vice president of the Real Estate Board of New York, said many large real estate deals have been stopped as a result.

"To say the problem is huge is an underestimate," Beck said. "It's stopping some transactions. It's holding up refinancing in situations that would be routine, and it's impacting new construction."

William McCahill, executive vice president of Fleet Bank, which has $22 billion in real estate loans, said the firm has put two financing transactions on hold in New York because the properties do not have adequate terrorism insurance.

One is a $300 million loan for the purchase of an existing building, and the other is a construction loan of approximately $100 million.

"It comes into play in every major deal now," McCahill said, adding that projects requiring more than $100 million in financing face the biggest hurdles in getting loans.

Matthew Ostrower, vice president of Morgan Stanley Dean Witter, said he does not expect lenders to foreclose on properties that do not have adequate terrorism insurance. But he does expect that owners will have higher loan costs and may have difficulty getting new financing when their current lending agreements expire.

"It's not just bad for landlords," he said. "It's bad for tenants. These costs get shared." Creamer, of GMAC, said the problem is slowly getting worse as long as Congress does not act.

"It's more of a water torture process," he said. "It's one drip at a time. It's not a floodgate but it's getting worse one month at a time. This is quickly becoming a crisis."

Jennifer --
This is from a VERY dear friend of mine. We were best friends in college. Anyway, he's a lawyer in Montgomery County, MD and as you can see from his e-mail, a VERY GOOD REPUBLICAN. Would you take a look and let me know what I should advise him to do? I realize it won't be Pres or VP but there must be someone over there who might be able to do this. It's local so no travel involved and there is a pretty decent audience to address. What do you think?
thanks,
arlene

Arlene -- sorry I missed your call and sorry to hear about Danny's father. Things sounded pretty crazy in the background and am sorry to add one more thing to your list. Anyway, the details are these: Our County Bar Association has its Law Day luncheon on the first Friday in May, which is May 3rd. We usually have between 350-500 attend. We need a speaker to speak for no more than 20 minutes. Being the good Republican that I am in a county full of Democrats, and because this luncheon is when the gavel is turned over to me as president of the association, I thought that it would be great to have someone from the White House. Unsure of how high to go or just who might be interested, if anyone. President, Vice-President, White House Counsel, White House maid or butler... whoever. Anyway, I had thought about this months ago, but then sort of gave up on it after September 11th. Now, however, as the date is approaching I would really like to see if this could still work. Any ideas on a person to talk to would be great. I might add that I was a precinct chairman in Montgomery County for Bush-Cheney.

Arlene, thank you again. Give my best to Danny. Hope the girls are doing well. Look forward to seeing you soon. Harry

If anyone has any concerns with the text of the victims rights constitutional amendment as Viet presented it to us, please let me know by the end of the day on Wednesday. As we discussed at the meeting, the Department is interested in potentially having a White House ceremony announcing the President's support for the amendment during National Crime Victims Week, which is April 21-27. Thank you.

Tim - Joe Hagin suggested I visit with you about the upcoming International Democratic Union Leaders' Meeting which POTUS has agreed to host. This is an organization of center and center-right parties. The last time the US hosted this event was under President Reagan in 1985. The Republican National Committee is the dues payer for the American membership, which is held by the American Democratic Union, chaired by Haley Barbour.

Let me know if there's a time that's convenient for me to stop by. I will forward a separate email with background information on the Conference and IDU.

LOTT HINTS PICKERING MIGHT WITHDRAW IF LOSS LIKELY IN JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, Miss., indicated today that Charles W. Pickering Sr., an embattled Mississippi nominee for the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, might withdraw if it becomes clear the Judiciary Committee will reject his nomination. Lott, who yesterday obtained a one-week delay in the committee's vote on Pickering's nomination, said he still hopes the panel will send the nomination to the full Senate. But he said Pickering has to think about his choices. "I'm not advocating this, but he's got to decide whether he wants to go forward with a vote if the votes aren't there, whether he wants to terminate the process," Lott said. He also said after meeting with President Bush this morning that Bush is "disgusted" with the way Senate Democrats have treated Pickering's nomination. Lott said the president expressed concern about the slow

of action on appellate court nominees in general and "weighed in on a personal basis" on Pickering.

Brett - Hi, I'm the senior counsel in Barbara's office at DOJ Public Affairs. Here are some of the relevant Burton stories you thought everyone should be emailed. I'll send a daily email with additions on the subject. Take care.

The Associated Press, February 27, 2002
HEADLINE: Congressman Wants FBI Records
BYLINE: MELISSA B. ROBINSON

Faced with a contempt threat, the Justice Department agreed Wednesday to give a congressional committee records on the Boston FBI's handling of mob informants in the 1960s, the committee chairman said.

"My committee has been investigating this tragic case for over a year," said House Government Reform Chairman Dan Burton. "We've finally reached an agreement with the Justice Department to see the documents we need to see to move forward with this investigation."

A department spokesman declined comment, saying he was reviewing the details.

For now, the agreement settles the showdown between Burton and the White House over its use of executive privilege to shield prosecutorial documents from congressional scrutiny. The dispute had led to charges by both Democrats and Republicans that Bush was trying to run an "imperial" presidency.

At a committee hearing Wednesday, Burton said he might try to hold President Bush in contempt because he and Attorney General John Ashcroft had yet to comply with a subpoena for the documents.

After department officials and committee aides met later, the department agreed to provide five documents in question, the aides said. The committee had sought 10 records, but four were found to be irrelevant to the case or not responsive to the subpoena. One was provided earlier. Executive privilege is a doctrine recognized by the courts that ensures presidents can get candid advice in private without fear it will become public.

Bush invoked it in December when he ordered Ashcroft not to turn the Boston records over. He argued that releasing the records could have a chilling effect on prosecutors' willingness to discuss criminal matters. Burton has focused on revelations that Joseph Salvati of Boston spent 30 years in prison for a murder he did not commit even though the FBI had evidence of his innocence.

HEADLINE: Burton drafting contempt citation against Bush to get FBI records from the 1960s

BYLINE: By MELISSA B. ROBINSON, Associated Press Writer

The chairman of a House committee said Wednesday he may try to hold President Bush in contempt of Congress for failing to turn over Justice Department records on the FBI's handling of mob informants in Boston in the 1960s.

Rep. Dan Burton, R-Ind., chairman of the Government Reform Committee, said during a hearing on the Boston case that his panel's legal staff "is preparing a contempt citation."

If Bush and Attorney General John Ashcroft "continue to be recalcitrant, I hope everyone on this committee will support me in getting the House to move this forward," Burton said.

It's unclear how long Burton will wait for the documents before deciding to bring the citation before his committee for consideration. If he does, and the committee approves it, he would then have to convince the House's Republican leaders to bring the citation against a GOP president to the full House for a vote.

Bush ordered Ashcroft to withhold the documents from the committee in December. He cited executive privilege, a doctrine recognized by the courts that ensures presidents can get candid advice in private without fear it will become public.

Bush argued that releasing records could have a chilling effect on prosecutors' willingness to discuss criminal matters.

Committee members of both parties have argued the documents should be released to Congress so it can fulfill its responsibility of monitoring the executive branch's activities.

With regard to the Boston case, they want to ensure that past excesses of the FBI aren't repeated. Among the facts Burton's committee has learned since it began looking into the issue is the FBI's knowledge that an innocent man was convicted of a murder actually committed by an FBI informant.

HEADLINE: UNLIKELY FRIENDS, ENEMIES BURTON PROBE RILES BUSH, WINS PRAISE FROM DEMOCRATS

BYLINE: By Wayne Washington, Globe Staff

WASHINGTON - Dan Burton is a conservative Republican who has been liberal in his scorn for Democrats.

Few Republicans in Congress are seen by their Democratic counterparts as more partisan, more scandal-raking than Burton, a 10-term representative from Indiana. As chairman of the House Committee on Government Reform, he has conducted hearings on Bill Clinton's White House and presidential pardons, Democratic fund-raising, and the Clinton administration's handling of the FBI raid in Waco, Texas.

So how come Massachusetts Democrats have started saying such nice things about Burton? Representative William D. Delahunt of Quincy calls him "passionate." Representative Barney Frank of Newton says some of Burton's recent actions have been "impressive."

The surprising praise stems from Burton's investigation into how the false testimony of a murderous FBI informant sent four men to prison in 1967 for slaying Edward "Teddy" Deegan in Chelsea, a crime they did not commit. Two of the men died in prison. Two served about 30 years each before their convictions were overturned.

Burton will continue digging into the case today, when another committee hearing is scheduled.

For more than a year now, the Government Reform Committee has trained a sharp focus on what the FBI knew about the informant, the lengths it went to protect him, and its willingness to allow innocent men to be imprisoned on testimony the agency knew to be false. That focus has put Burton at odds with the Justice Department and the Bush White House.

Delahunt, a former Norfolk County district attorney with an interest in the case, says he originally preferred to have the House Judiciary Committee do the investigating. Three Massachusetts congressmen - Delahunt, Frank, and Martin T. Meehan - serve on Judiciary, and they would have surely gotten involved in a Boston-related case.

Republicans control the House, however, and that panel's Republican chairman, F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. of Wisconsin, had little interest in pursuing a case that would almost certainly be a headache for the Bush administration.

To the surprise of many Democrats, Burton pressed ahead. He decided to conduct hearings and invited the Massachusetts Democrats to participate. The invitation was more than mere congressional courtesy. Delahunt, for example, was dispatched to Boston last week to take the deposition of a retired FBI agent who declined to travel to Washington to provide testimony.

Delahunt said his working relationship with Burton has been terrific.

"He's treated me with respect, and we've gotten full cooperation,"

Delahunt said.

Mark Corallo, spokesman for the Government Reform Committee, said fairness and justice are Burton's main interests.

"Contrary to popular belief, the chairman has always believed you have to look at the issues objectively," Corallo said. Democrats "know he's still a conservative Republican, but there are instances where everybody can come together," he said.

Well, not everybody.

The Justice Department has refused to comply with a committee subpoena for FBI records in the case. President Bush has issued an order contending that executive privilege allows his administration to keep the documents secret.

That position has infuriated Burton, who contends officials at the highest levels of the FBI, including then-director J. Edgar Hoover, knew the men being convicted were not guilty.

"He knew it, and his name should not be emblazoned on the FBI's headquarters," Burton said on "60 Minutes" last month. "We ought to change the name of that building."

Such fiery rhetoric is typically aimed at Democrats.

"Burton's willingness to take on the Bush administration has been impressive," Frank said. "His willingness to go after the memory of J. Edgar Hoover is impressive."

In the past, Frank has been one of Burton's sharpest critics.

"I thought his Clinton stuff was wacky," he said. "I'm critical of his positions. I'm less critical now of his motives."

Frank said he's particularly struck by the timing of Burton's actions.

"We've been in this atmosphere where we're giving more power to law enforcement," Frank said. "We should give law enforcement more power. They're the good guys. They're protecting us. But Burton is showing what can happen when that power is abused."

Still, some Democrats squirm at the news that Burton is getting praise from members of their party. Frank said colleagues have told him, "Don't be so nice to the guy."

Frank said he and his Massachusetts colleagues are giving praise where praise is due.

"Yes, I dislike Dan Burton," Frank said. "If he went back to doing some of the Clinton stuff, I'd be critical. But what goal is served by not encouraging him to go after these FBI abuses? Why would I not want to encourage that?"

Delahunt said he has sensed no reluctance from Burton about confronting the administration.

"In my mind, Dan Burton has proven himself beyond any reasonable doubt that he's interested in the facts of this case," Delahunt said. Corallo, the Government Reform Committee spokesman, said Burton, who spent last week at home in Indiana with his sick wife, feels vindicated by the praise of Democrats. The relationship between Burton and Democrats has gone a long way toward bridging a partisan gap that developed during the Clinton administration, Corallo said. "When you can start smiling at each other in the halls again, that's nice," Corallo said.

HEADLINE: Bush White House, Congress in a Tug-of-War over Balance of Power
BYLINE: By James Kuhnenn

WASHINGTON -- The Bush White House provoked a major lawsuit and is angering even its political allies in a campaign to increase its control over federal spending and public information. At stake are public access to White House deliberations, the fate of federal projects in communities across America, and the ever-shifting balance of power between Congress and the presidency. Last week, the General Accounting Office, the investigative arm of Congress, sued Vice President Dick Cheney to learn who participated in meetings he chaired while formulating the administration's energy policy. The suit was the latest move in a series of clashes that illustrate the administration's determination to reverse what it believes is a decades-long erosion of presidential authority. Congress is fighting back on other fronts as well. Some influential lawmakers, including senior Republicans, are bristling at efforts by the White House Office of Management and Budget to limit spending on projects in their home districts. And when the White House rejected a request by Rep. Dan Burton, R-Ind., for Justice Department documents on organized crime dating to 1967, Burton threatened to hold President Bush in contempt of Congress. Power struggles between Congress and the White House date to the nation's founders. But the current quarrels are distinguished by the administration's unyielding stance and the bipartisan furor it has aroused. They are especially noteworthy given a president who promised an administration characterized by openness and affability. "It's hard to be an open populist when you're trying to protect presidential power," said Marshall Wittmann, a Republican strategist and fellow at the Hudson Institute, a conservative policy research center. But for Cheney and Bush, fortifying the presidency is as much a policy goal as cutting taxes and building up the nation's defenses. "One of the things that I feel an obligation on, and I know the president does, too ... is to pass on our offices in better shape than we found them," Cheney said recently on ABC's "This Week." "We are weaker today as an institution because of the unwise compromises that have been made over the last 30 or 35 years." That view has brought the GAO lawsuit and the thundering contempt-of-Congress threat from Burton, the chairman of the House Government Reform Committee. It has also led to a confrontation over what many lawmakers maintain is their fundamental right under the Constitution -- the power to decide how to spend taxpayers' money. The White House and its budget office are out to limit Congress' practice of adding to spending legislation special projects for the folks back home. Upon delivering the budget to Congress earlier this month, White House Budget Director Mitchell Daniels declared that such spending "has gotten out of hand." The administration took a swipe at Congress in the budget document, singling out an $ 80,000 grant to a Wisconsin county sheriff's department for the purchase of an Ice Angel Windsled, used for winter rescues on frozen Lake Superior.

It was no coincidence that the Republican Bush administration zeroed in on a project championed by the ranking Democrat on the Appropriations Committee, Wisconsin's David Obey. Obey was furious. But Daniels had angered Republicans, too. To make up for a shortfall in a federal education program, he wanted to eliminate hundreds of health and education projects that members inserted into spending legislation last year.

Appropriations Committee Chairman Bill Young, R-Fla., fumed.

"All wisdom on the allocation of federal grant funding does not reside in the executive branch," he wrote Daniels on Feb. 6. "Unless the Constitution is amended, Congress will continue to exercise its discretion over federal funds and will earmark those funds for purposes we deem appropriate."

National moods, scandals and the personalities of the individuals occupying the White House have dictated the power swings from White House to Congress over the years. Congress was at its peak of power in the post-Watergate period.

"As time has passed, it has swung back to the executive," said Gary Bass, executive director of OMB Watch, a research group that advocates openness in government. "And this administration has put much greater stock in protecting executive turf."

In the end, the Bush White House may not win all these confrontations. But by drawing a line across Pennsylvania Avenue and daring Congress to cross it, Bush and Cheney have done more to assert presidential power than previous administrations.

But the White House faces significant political risks. The public may be more likely to believe that a president is hiding something rather than protecting a constitutional principle.

Among the energy industry executives who advised Cheney last year was Kenneth Lay, then Enron Corp. chairman, and a major fund-raiser for Bush's presidential campaign. By fighting the GAO, the White House gives fuel to critics who say that Cheney, a former energy company executive himself, was drafting a policy to benefit the administration's industry friends. Others say that Enron and energy policy aside, a successful White House stand could dramatically alter how Congress performs its job as a check on the executive branch.

"This could have huge, huge policy implications," said Bass of OMB Watch.

"I do believe that Cheney and the White House are pursuing a principled issue on the energy task force. ...This is beyond Enron and the work of the Cheney task force. This is an issue about executive power."

HEADLINE: Pizza Crust, Principles and Politics
BYLINE: Dana Milbank

It was the modern political equivalent of Moses and the Burning Bush. On Inauguration Day 2001, Bush presidential aides entered the White House to discover the Miracle of the Warm Pizza Crust.

The famous crust was found, appropriately enough, in a pizza box that had been left on a desk when a Bush aide arrived for work on the new administration's first day. The discovery was included in a list of alleged vandalism of White House offices by departing Clinton aides, furnished by the Bush White House to the investigative arm of Congress, the General Accounting Office. But when presented with the warm-crust allegation, Clinton officials pointed out that no Clinton aides assigned to that office were even in the White House complex after Jan. 19 -- the day before inauguration.

This means that even if the Clinton aides left at midnight the night before and the Bush aides showed up at noon on Inauguration Day, the pizza crust stayed warm for 12 hours.

That the Bush administration would cooperate so freely in the GAO investigation of such matters as pizza temperature in the Clinton White House stands in stark contrast to the administration's stand against another GAO investigation, this one involving Vice President Cheney's energy task force. In protecting the identities and requests of outsiders who met with the task force, top White House officials have indicated they may challenge the constitutionality of the law empowering the GAO -- a move that, if successful, would pretty much put the 80-year-old office out of business.

In the GAO's Clinton vandalism probe, due to wrap up in April, the Bush administration has furnished the agency with a list of allegations.

"We are saddened that especially after the events of September 11, 2001, the White House continues to push this matter," two former Clinton aides in charge of White House administration, Mark Lindsay and Mike Malone, wrote to the GAO last month.

Lindsay and Malone pointed out some apparent flaws in the catalogue of Clinton vandalism, including the Warm Pizza Crust incident. The Bush team gave the GAO a photo of a dirty room in the White House complex, but the Clinton aides wrote that "the office featured in the photograph was vacated at least one week prior to Inauguration Day, and had been in fact completely cleaned by the morning of January 20th."

Then there was the case of Room 145 in the building next to the White House. The Bush administration said "historical artifacts" had been taken from the office. "We understand that at least one of the artifacts, an historic fireplace mirror, can be found hanging over the fireplace in [Bush] Chief of Staff [Andrew H.] Card's office," Lindsay and Malone wrote. The GAO itself, in its suit filed last week against Cheney over the energy task force records, argues that the White House worked to "facilitate the investigation" into alleged Clinton vandalism. The suit points out that before President Bush came to office, "the executive branch has complied with countless GAO requests for information." The Clinton White House gave GAO the names of outside consultants who met with its health care task force and "thousands of documents" from a task force on trade relations with China.

Even the Nixon administration, no standard of transparency, relented during the Watergate years when the GAO wished to examine White House records. "To litigate the GAO's authority would bring only negative publicity and defeat," former Nixon counsel John Dean has said.

Apples and oranges, says the Bush White House. Previous GAO requests did not involve requests for information about meetings of the president or vice president, Bush aides say, while the current request is for meetings held by Cheney in his role as head of the task force. "This would be something we've never seen before," a senior Bush aide says.

But that principle is a bit murky. While the GAO had not previously asked the current White House for information regarding the contacts of the president or vice president, the Bush White House has been quick to relinquish to Congress such information from the Clinton White House. Last September, Rep. Dan Burton (R-Ind.), chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, asked for e-mails from the Clinton White House to see whether campaign contributors had inappropriate influence over President Bill Clinton and Vice President Al Gore. The National Archives, noting that Bush "agreed to this release," turned over 2,000 pages of e-mails two months later, including those to Gore from his staff and between senior Gore staff.

Also last year, Bush raised no objection to handing over to Burton's committee 2,475 pages of Clinton documents related to the Marc Rich pardon -- including phone records, a list of visitors cleared to enter the White House and notes of Clinton conversations with a foreign leader.

Clinton did not object. But such flexibility was learned the hard way. Lanny Davis, who was Clinton's special counsel, says Bush is right to stiff the GAO, and Clinton was right to try to block earlier congressional "encroachments," too. Problem is, it never works.

"Been there, done that," Davis said. "We abandoned principle under the pressure of politics, and unfortunately, that's going to happen here."

The face-to-face Chief of Staff meeting (on political activity guidance) has been changed from tomorrow to Monday, March 4 at 3pm in room 472 of the EEOB. Ken Mehlman has to go to Iowa tomorrow for a funeral. Please let me know ASAP if the new meeting time on Monday does not work for you. Also please remember to bring your WH Liaisons to the meeting on Monday. Thank you.

----- Forwarded by Edward Ingle/WHO/EOP on 02/28/2002

Brett Kavanaugh (White House Counsel's Office) and Ken Mehlman (White House Political Affairs) will be on hand to provide advice and counsel with regard to the do's and don'ts regarding your participation in politically-related activities, as well as your politically-related discussions with your respective Secretaries. We will also cover the do's and don'ts of PAS participation in politically-related activities (including the Secretary and Schedule Cs), since the rules for PASs are somewhat different than those related to you as a non-career SES. Brett is meeting tomorrow with your respective General Counsels to go over these issues.

While there will be a strong need this election year for the legal and responsible participation of political appointees in the political process, we want to make sure that we are all on the same page regarding the rules of the road given the enormous amount of public scrutiny on this Administration's political activities going forward. We would also ask that you bring your White House Liaisons with you for this meeting given they will also be involved in helping your agency's political appointees understand the rules. Cathy Hargraves of Cabinet Affairs will be contacting your assistants to confirm your attendance. Thank you.

I always send Treasury issues to you, however, general 401(k) issues have been going to Helgi. This specific Treasury 401k memo was not staffed to Counsel's Office to my knowledge. I looked in my LRM and red tag files and it is not here.

REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

ON

EMPLOYER STOCK IN 401(k) PLANS

February 28, 2002

REV_00140950

Executive Summary

The Department of the Treasury, as head of the President's Retirement Security Task Force, has undertaken a review and analysis of the impact of placing a percentage cap on employer stock holdings by 401(k) participants. In formulating its conclusions, the Treasury Department has examined information provided by the Department of Labor, reviewed surveys of 401(k) participants conducted by the Employee Benefits Research Institute (EBRI) and the Investment Company Institute, and held discussions with a number of benefit administrators of plans that hold employer stock. Based on this review, the Department concludes that placing arbitrary caps on individual 401(k) account holdings in employer stock would have a widespread impact on 401(k) plan participants and potentially severe disruptive effects on the stock prices of several major companies. Data show that as many as 1 in 5 of 401(k) participants would be forced to change their investment allocations if employer stock holdings were limited to 20 percent. Moreover, at one major company, for example, enforcement of a 20 percent limit on employer stock holding would precipitate the sale of hundreds of millions of shares, an amount equal to almost 16 times the daily trading volume. At another company, it would be 37 times daily trading volume.

Background and History

Pension schemes in the United States have always been voluntary. Private pensions, as a form of employee compensation, have been a competitive tool employed by firms to attract employees. The nation's pension system has evolved in recent years into one that emphasizes two of the country's quintessential values: personal responsibility and freedom of choice. This evolution provides workers much greater opportunity than ever before to build retirement savings, but also imposes a greater degree of individual responsibility in preparing for retirement.

Since 1974 the labor and financial markets have undergone major change. As the economy has evolved from one based on heavy industry to one based on the provision of information and services, the work force has become increasingly mobile and highly educated. For the typical American worker, job and even career changes have become commonplace. During the same period, as a result of deregulation, financial markets have made a wide array of new investment vehicles available to consumers. This has provided the average consumer the opportunity to build wealth through a broader range of investments offering higher rates of return for long-term savings than the traditional passbook account. As the relationships between workers and employers and consumers and financial markets have evolved so has the pension system. This is reflected through current federal policies that provide incentives for retirement wealth development through tax advantaged portable vehicles like Individual Retirement Accounts and defined contribution plans.

Since today's workers are less likely to be tied to an individual firm for their entire careers than their parents were, they must increasingly look to their own resources to build sufficient wealth for a secure retirement. Today's workers need plans that allow them to undertake retirement planning independently. Under defined benefit plans, most retirement planning and investment decisions are left to the employer. Pension contributions for employees are placed in a common fund that is controlled by the employer. The employer decides on the size of contributions, their timing, and the choice of assets in which the fund is invested. This results in a one-size-fits-all type of system that does not account for differences in employees, preferences for saving and the timing of consumption during their lifetime. And because all contributions become part of a consolidated overall fund, employees may have no sense of ownership of pension assets and no feeling of building personal wealth for the future. Since defined benefit plans are tied directly to employment with a specific firm they tend not to be portable when employees change jobs. Defined benefit plans offer the advantage of security in that benefits are guaranteed at a certain level. However, moving to a new job from one with a defined benefit plan often means a major sacrifice in future benefits, whether or not the move is voluntary.

Defined Contribution Plans

Defined contribution plans, about half of which are 401(k) plans, return most decision making to the individual. For purposes of this report we will refer to 401(k) plans, but the discussion and recommendations generally apply to all defined contribution plans. There are about 50 million defined contribution plan participants, of which about 42 million are 401(k) participants. Some workers may participate in more than one type of defined contribution plan. Under a defined contribution plan individual employees have their own accounts in which they can build their own wealth. Employees are allowed, within limits set in the tax code, to choose the level of their pension plan contributions. In order to encourage higher rates of retirement saving, these limits were expanded by the Economic Growth and Tax Relief Reconciliation Act signed by the President last year.

Employees also have more latitude in choosing the timing of contributions with defined contribution plans. As an individual's circumstances change, 401(k) plans allow for higher contributions in some years than others. In virtually all plans, employees have the ability to choose the investment options in which their own contributions are invested, and in many others they can allocate both their own and their employer's contributions into investments of their own choosing. This freedom to allocate among investments allows employees to choose the tradeoff between risk and return that suits them best. It also allows individuals to adjust their portfolios from one with higher potential returns and higher risk early in their careers to one that provides smaller but surer returns as they approach retirement.

The Role of Employer Stock in Defined Contribution Plans

Employer stock is an integral part of many 401(k) plans, particularly among those sponsored by America's largest firms. It may be offered as one of a number of investment options to which employees may allocate 401(k) assets. Employers may make matching contributions to employees' accounts in the form of company stock. Employees may be given specific incentives to invest in company stock. For example, some firms offer matches in the form of company stock or cash, but provide a higher match if the employee chooses his or her employer's stock. Some plans allow employees to sell matching contributions of employer stock at any time. Other plans require that employer stock provided by the employer as a matching contribution be held for an extended period of time.

Providing matching contributions in the form of company stock can have a number of benefits for both employers and employees. Companies may benefit from tax and cash flow advantages. Many companies believe that giving employees company stock builds their employees' loyalty to the company and gives them a greater economic incentive to work to promote the company's long-term economic prospects. Employees benefit directly when employers provide greater matching contributions to their 401(k) accounts. Also, research shows that employees themselves are more likely to participate in their company's 401(k) plan when their employer offers matching contributions.

Most defined contribution plans that include employer stock as an investment option or as a matching contribution are found in very large companies. For instance, for plans with fewer than 500 participants, the overall percentage of assets held in employer stock is less than 1 percent. In contrast, for plans with more than 5,000 participants, the overall percentage of assets held in employer stock is 26.6 percent. Large companies are also the ones more likely to offer their workers other retirement savings vehicles such as a defined benefit pension plan.

Issues and Conclusion

Recently introduced legislation on retirement security proposes to limit the holdings of company stock by individual plan participants in their 401(k) accounts. These proposed limits are expressed as a maximum percentage of the value of all 401(k) assets that an individual can hold in the form of company stock. The caps that have been discussed are 10 percent, which is the limit placed on company stock in defined benefits plans, or 20 percent. The proposals exempt employee stock ownership plans (ESOPs) from these restrictions.

In preparing its recommendations on enhancing retirement security, the President's Retirement Security Task Force sought to enhance workers' investment options, including their ability to diversify their 401(k) accounts according to their individual situations. The Task Force rejected the idea of imposing federal limitations on those options by arbitrarily setting a ceiling on the amount of employer stock a worker may hold in his or her own 401(k) plan. Also, the Task Force wanted to avoid establishing rules that discouraged employers from matching workers' own contributions to their 401(k) accounts. The Task Force -- and the President -- concluded that the most appropriate public policy is to give workers as much flexibility as possible while encouraging employers to provide matching contributions, and to give employees regular disclosures regarding their accounts and financial education so that employees make informed investment decisions.

The next section explains the President's proposal and the following section sets forth in greater detail why the Administration opposes arbitrary, federally imposed caps on workers' holdings of employer stock in their 401(k) plans.

The President's Recommendation for Enhancing Worker Choice

Asset diversification is a bedrock principle of prudent long-term investing. Congress established 401(k) plans to promote individual retirement saving. But a plan requirement mandating that all or a portion of an employee's 401(k) account be invested in employer stock runs counter to this diversification principle. Concentration of employer stock in a worker's retirement plan creates a double risk for workers -- if their company fails, they lose their jobs and that portion of their retirement savings. At the same time, employer matching contributions are a form of compensation and as such an employee should have a right to invest them as the employee sees fit.

The President has recommended that Congress require that employees be free to sell company stock contributed to their 401(k) plan by their employer at any time after they have been participating in the company's 401(k) plan for three years. An employee stock ownership plan (ESOP) will not be subject to the diversification rules as long as no (1) participant elective contributions (i.e. 401(k) contributions), (2) matching contributions, or (3) employer contributions which are used to pass the 401(k) nondiscrimination tests, are made to the plan.

This change balances the desire of some companies to offer company stock as matching contributions with employees' freedom to pursue a retirement savings plan appropriate to their situations. Allowing employees to freely hold or sell employer stock would have a disciplining effect on companies -- employees will want to hold stock in good companies. In most 401(k) plans, workers already have considerable autonomy to diversify both their own contributions and their employer's matching contribution, except for employer stock. This change ensures that autonomy extends to all assets in a worker's 401(k) plan.

The three-year period is not a requirement. Some companies today give their workers immediate freedom to sell employer stock. These companies should be applauded and their practices would be unaffected by the change we are proposing. For other companies, however, the proposed change is a substantial departure from their current practice. In particular, many of these companies want their workers to feel directly invested in their company's future prospects by giving them an equity stake in the company. A three-year wait before guaranteeing workers' freedom to diversify allows employers to build that incentive without locking in a substantial portion of a worker's retirement security to employer stock.

Congress Should Not Arbitrarily Limit Employees' Investment Options in 401(k) Plans

Arbitrary caps have serious drawbacks. They fail to consider that workers make investment decisions regarding their 401(k) accounts in the broader context of their household's complete portfolio of retirement savings. Caps imposed on 401(k) accounts may be easily circumvented, both by employers and employees, and may in fact create incentives for both to do so. Arbitrary caps also would cause disruption in the market for certain large company stock, as substantial amounts of stock in certain companies would have to be sold at once. Caps may also discourage employer contributions to their employees' accounts, leaving the employees worse off. In turn, reduction in employer contributions may discourage workers' participation. Finally, assets in 401(k) accounts belong to the workers and the government should not arbitrarily restrict how they choose to invest their funds.

Arbitrary caps ignore workers total retirement portfolios.

For some individuals, holding higher levels of employer stock within their 401(k) plan may be desirable, particularly if they are well diversified outside of their 401(k) plan. Purchasing employer stock through a 401(k) plan is a tax-effective way for employees to make that investment.

Many 401(k) participants also have defined benefit plans, profit sharing plans, IRAs and personal savings as part of their retirement savings. Thus, participants who may appear to be overly concentrated in employer stock when their 401(k) accounts are viewed alone may be diversified over their portfolio of retirement assets. For instance, a spouse may have retirement assets that the couple took into account when deciding on their asset allocation in the other spouse's 401(k) account. Or a worker may have 401(k) or other retirement assets through a previous employer.

Data gathered in a survey of 401(k) participants undertaken by the Investment Company Institute 401(k) Plan Participants: Characteristics, Contributions, and Account Activity, Spring 2000, The Investment Company Institute. The study is based on a random digit dialing sample of telephone exchanges. Sample size is 1,181. Margin of error is plus or minus 2 percent. Half of all households surveyed had only bank or thrift deposits outside their company sponsored plans, 39 percent had stocks, bonds, annuities, mutual funds or real estate besides their primary residence. indicate that:

ú Thirty nine percent are covered by a defined benefit plan in addition to their 401(k) plan. (The same survey indicates that employees are likely to hold a higher percentage of total assets in company stock if their employer also offers a defined benefit plan. Respondents who have a defined benefit plan invest an average of 24 percent of overall assets in company stock, while those with none invest only 13 percent in company stock.);

ú Thirty three percent have IRAs; and ú Twenty eight percent have spouses who are covered by a 401(k) plan, a defined benefit plan, or both.

Data from a recent survey by EBRI Vanderhi, Jack L., EBRI Special Report, Company Stock in 401(k) Plans: Results of a Survey of ISCEBS Members, January 31, 2002, Employee Benefit Research Institute. This was a survey of members of the International Society of Certified Employee Benefit Specialists. Since the sample is not representative of all 401(k) plans, the results should be interpreted as suggestive of, rather than representative of, the wider population of 401(k) plans. suggest that 401(k) plans are more likely to include company stock as an option if the company also offers a defined benefit plan. In the survey, 60 percent of all 401(k) plans in which there is also a defined benefit plan offer employer stock as a 401(k) option, while only 35 percent of plans without a defined benefit plan do so.

Arbitrary caps will be difficult to administer.

Unlike the 10 percent cap on employer securities held in defined benefit plans, caps in defined contribution plans must be enforced on a participant-by-participant basis. In a large plan, this would necessitate tens of thousands of individual computations annually (or even more frequently). It would also require divestment of employer stock on a participant-by-participant basis, with each participant then needing to give the plan administrator instructions on how to reinvest those proceeds. Efforts to minimize that complexity by using a plan-wide arbitrary cap do not recognize that individuals may have allocations far below the cap. Changes in the value of employer stock and the value of all other assets in the plan further complicate these calculations and complicate the asset allocation decisions each participant must make.

Arbitrary caps will require a large number of 401(k) participants to sell employer stock that they currently own.

We estimate that one out of every five 401(k) participants may have to sell employer stock if caps were imposed. This calculation is based on a BLS estimate of the fraction of participants with the option of investing in employer stock and an EBRI/ICI estimate of the fraction of participants with the option of investing in employer stock who report holding assets above the proposed cap. The proposed caps would require divestiture at a specified point in time after it has been determined that the cap has been exceeded. Forcing sales of all stock above the cap at a point in time could disrupt the market for those stocks where the amount that must be sold is sufficiently large to affect the stock price. At one major company, for example, enforcement of a 20 percent limit on employer stock holding would precipitate the sale of hundreds of millions of shares, an amount equal to almost 16 times the daily trading volume. At another company, it would be 37 times daily trading volume.

Increases in the market value of company stock could trigger the caps, forcing employees to sell the stock during periods in which it is outperforming other 401(k) assets. This dynamic could particularly disadvantage lower income workers who cannot afford to save outside the 401(k) plans. Higher paid workers would, of course, have the option of using assets outside the plan to purchase the stock once the caps were triggered.

Arbitrary caps may discourage company matches.

If most employees hold company stock that is already near the cap, the company will not be able to provide generous matches for new contributions in company stock without exceeding the cap. As a result, rather than making a matching contribution in cash, some companies may choose to reduce or eliminate the employer match. Clearly, workers are better off receiving employer stock as matching contributions to their own 401(k) contributions than receiving no matching contribution at all. Reductions in company matches would likely lead to reductions in the amount of employee savings. Studies show that the amount of a company's match is a key determinant of employee contribution rates.

401(k) accounts represent a form of compensation and property that belong to the employees.

Arbitrary caps on employees 401(k) investment choices challenge fundamental notions of private property rights. 401(k) participant contributions and matching contributions are a form of employee compensation, and government should not restrict or limit employees ability to invest their assets as they see fit. Rather, government policies should promote the ability of employees to make informed, educated decisions about how they wish to allocate their assets. This is why the President's retirement security proposals include a renewed call for incentives for employers to provide employees with free, professional investment advice. It is also why the President is calling for quarterly statements of 401(k) plan performance to empower employees to track and manage their 401(k) assets in a manner best suited to their own individual retirement needs.

Workers and firms using other tax-preferred vehicles may easily circumvent arbitrary caps.

Imposing an arbitrary cap on employer stock provides an incentive for companies to use ESOPs instead of company matching with employer stock in a 401(k) plan. Also, with an arbitrary cap on employer stock in 401(k) plans, workers would still be able to invest retirement savings in employer stock through IRA accounts.

ú 48 percent of all firms represented in the survey offer company stock as an investment option.

ú Restrictions on sale of employee stock.

ú 13 percent of firms that provide employer stock as a matching contribution do not restrict the sale of employer stock. 27 percent restrict sales as long as an employee is a participant in the plan; 60 percent lift restrictions after age or service requirements have been met.

ú Average percent of company stock in employees, 401(k) accounts in those plans in which company stock is an investment option:

ú In 39 percent of the companies surveyed, employees hold an average of less than 10 percent of their 401(k) assets in the form of company stock.

ú In 42 percent of the companies surveyed, employees hold an average of between 10 and 50 percent of their 401(k) assets in the form of company stock.

ú In 18 percent of the companies surveyed, employees hold an average of more than 50 percent of their 401(k) assets in the form of company stock.

ú Only 14 percent of firms represented in the survey restrict the amount or percentage of employer stock that employees can hold in their 401(k) accounts.

ú Blackouts

ú 74 percent of respondents reported that their plans have undergone a blackout.

ú 30 percent of the respondents whose plans have undergone a blackout reported that the blackout period lasted two weeks or less, 39 percent reported that the period lasted between two weeks and one month, 31 percent reported that the period lasted more than one month.

Responses to Opinion Questions

ú 63 percent of respondents think that the government should limit a plan sponsor,s ability to require that matching contributions be invested in company stock.

ú 32 percent of respondents think that the government should limit an employee,s ability to invest in company stock.

ú 93 percent of respondents think that plan sponsors should advise their employees to diversify if company stock is offered as an investment option.

ú 61 percent of respondents think that problems resulting from employees investing their own contributions in company stock would be mitigated if employers could provide independent investment advice.

ú The respondents are sympathetic with the concept of blackouts. 79 percent think blackouts are fair to employees if they are required for a plan conversion and there is no company stock in the plan. If company stock is part of the plan that percentage falls to 72 percent.

ú 43 percent of respondents think there would be a decrease in matching contributions if matching contributions could consist of no more than 50 percent employer stock.

conflicts of interest from liberal opponents. "The strategy is one of defeat through caricature," says Thomas Jipping, a judicial expert at the Free Congress Foundation, a group that supports Pickering and other Bush nominees.

The new intensity of struggle over judicial nominees also reflects the realization that the federal bench profoundly affects US life, of course. Bush has been open about his desire to make US courts more conservative - as were his father and Ronald Reagan before him.

Pickering's future now turns on Democratic unity. If all 10 Democrats on the judiciary panel vote "no," his nomination won't make it to the Senate floor. "He will not be confirmed," predicted panel member Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D) of California on Feb. 24.

Senate postpones vote on Pickering nomination

Ben Bryant

The Sun Herald

February 27, 2002, Wednesday

At the request of Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., the Senate Judiciary Committee has postponed a vote on the nomination of Judge Charles W. Pickering Sr. to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

The vote, originally scheduled for Thursday, will take place "sometime next week," said Mimi Devlin, a spokesman for the committee's Democratic majority. Lott said he asked for the postponement to give Pickering more time to respond to written questions submitted to the judge by committee members three weeks ago. He said one senator, whom he did not identify, gave Pickering 78 questions. "I think that Judge Pickering has been treated very poorly," Lott said.

Meanwhile, four Pickering opponents from Mississippi took their case to Lott and Sen. Thad Cochran, R-Miss., in private meetings Tuesday. One of the judge's foes, Kathy Eglund of Gulfport, Miss., said his confirmation would mean "retrogression" on civil rights issues.

Eglund said the news media has distorted the level of support among Mississippi blacks for the judge, who has been endorsed by blacks in his hometown of Laurel and by Charles Evers, brother of slain civil rights leader Medgar Evers. But Pickering's home-state black proponents are more loud than large, said Eglund, a veteran of the NAACP who is serving her second term on the organization's national board of directors.

Pickering's nomination has been criticized by Democratic senators and interest groups that have called his legal record "insensitive and sometimes even hostile" to civil rights. They have also questioned whether he violated judicial ethics by intervening on behalf of a cross-burning suspect in 1995.

Egland and the rest of the four-person delegation from Mississippi assailed the judge for calling the cross burning, which took place in Walthall County, Miss., in 1993, a drunken prank."

Pickering asked federal prosecutors to reduce the charges against one of the three suspects, whom he deemed less responsible for the crime than the others.

"That (Pickering) would call burning a cross 'a drunken prank,' I can't tell you how offensive that is to me," said Richard Glisson, president of Students Envisioning Equality through Diversity at the University of Mississippi. "In fact, I'll go far enough to say that Sen. Lott is racially insensitive for nominating him."

Glisson and Egland were joined by Jolivet Anderson and Betty Thompson, both of Jackson, Miss., for the meetings with Lott and Cochran, who both said they still support Pickering.

But staffers for the Democratic senators on the Senate Judiciary Committee predicted the vote would go against the judge and said the delay would make no difference in the vote.

"We're pretty unified on this side," one said, echoing comments made Sunday by Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., a committee member.

Campaign-finance bill will pass this year, Daschle vows

Paul Leavitt

USA TODAY

Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., promised Tuesday that legislation revamping campaign-finance laws will be passed this year, and Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., who has been the bill's leading opponent, signaled that he won't try to block passage with a filibuster. Supporters want the Senate to pass the version that cleared the House last month. That would avoid a conference committee of House and Senate members to iron out differences. President Bush has indicated he likely would sign the legislation. -- Jim Drinkard

Senate battling over judicial nominations

U.S. District Judge D. Brooks Smith defended his record at his Senate confirmation hearing for the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia. Opponents say Smith ruled in a case in which he had a financial interest. He oversaw for a month a trial in 1997 in which Mid-State Bank was accused of complicity in a defendant's fraud scheme. His wife, Karen, was a bank officer, and he had stock in the bank. Smith said Mid-State's role wasn't apparent, but when it arose, he took himself off the case. "None of the parties, lawyers or judges, nor the trustee has questioned my conduct," Smith said.

The Judiciary Committee delayed a vote on another nominee, Charles Pickering of Mississippi, for a seat on the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans. Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., sought the delay so Pickering could respond to more questions. Critics question his views on civil rights, but some blacks in his state have come to his defense.

Bush pushes marriage in welfare plan

President Bush's proposed changes to welfare include new federal spending on programs to promote marriage and sexual abstinence. He wants to spend $ 200 million in federal money and $ 100 million from states on programs such as premarital counseling and education. He also wants $ 135 million to discourage premarital sex among youth. Abstinence prevents "unwanted pregnancies and sexually transmitted diseases," he said. Federal Panel Imposes Miss. Redistricting Plan; Outcome Favors Republican Rep. Pickering

Thomas B. Edsall
The Washington Post
February 27, 2002, Wednesday,

A three-judge federal panel yesterday imposed a Mississippi congressional redistricting plan putting Rep. Charles W. "Chip" Pickering Jr. (R) and Rep. Ronnie Shows (D) together in a district that favors the Republican.

An appeal to Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia was rejected hours later.

The outcome infuriated Democrats and civil rights advocates who argued that black voters will have far less influence under the federal court plan than they would have under a state court plan ruled unconstitutional by the federal panel. The state and federal courts entered the dispute after the state legislature was unable to agree on new congressional district lines. The federal court acted in part because the Justice Department had delayed granting "preclearance" approval to the state plan as required by the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Districts had to be in place so that candidates preparing to run could meet the March 1 filing deadline for federal office in Mississippi.

Rep. Martin Frost (D-Tex.), who has overseen national Democratic redistricting strategy, attacked political appointees at the Justice Department, charging they "cynically manipulated the Voting Rights Act to help Republicans by hurting African American voters. . . . The Bush Justice Department has abused its most fundamental duty -- fairly enforcing America's civil rights."

Yesterday, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) submitted written questions to Attorney General John D. Ashcroft asking whether career attorneys recommended approval of the state plan and whether they were overruled by political appointees.

Asked whether that was the case, Justice Department spokesman Dan Nelson said, "We don't comment on internal deliberative documents," referring to recommendations made by the career staff. "I couldn't give you any guidance on that." He said no one from the White House tried to influence departmental consideration of the Mississippi case.

Career lawyers in the voting rights division at Justice declined to discuss their recommendations or views about the Mississippi case. Former career lawyers contended, however, that the preclearance delays were based on questions that are not a legitimate part of a voting rights review. The questions raised by Justice involved the legality of a Mississippi Chancery Court ordering a redistricting plan.

Paul Hancock, a former deputy assistant attorney general for civil rights, said preclearance review is limited to just one question: "only whether the submitted plan is retrogressive in purpose or effect." He said the Justice letter questioning the state court plan "seems to be much more political in nature than programatic."

The three-judge panel, all GOP appointees, went substantially beyond the preclearance issue in ordering its own plan into effect.

The federal judges -- E. Grady Jolly, Henry T. Wingate and David C. Bramlette -- wrote that under Article 1, Section 4 of the Constitution -- "The Times, Places and manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof" -- the state court had no authority to draw new congressional districts.

"We can only conclude that the requirements [of the Constitution] were not met in this case, as there has been no indication that the chancery court had any legislative authority to draw the state's districts."

Under the rejected state court plan, Shows and Pickering would have been placed in a district in which blacks, a heavily Democratic constituency, made up 37.5 percent of the voting age population. Under the federal court plan, blacks make up 30 percent.

Scalia, who handles emergency appeals from the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas, has a number of ties to the Pickering family. In 1997, the Associated Press reported that Scalia presided over Pickering's first congressional swearing-in ceremony and that Pickering's father, U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering, arranged a trip for Scalia to Mississippi to give a speech.

Scalia Denies Miss. Dems' Appeal

February 26, 2002 Tuesday

A U.S. Supreme Court justice on Tuesday denied an emergency appeal filed by Democrats in Mississippi's congressional redistricting dispute, which could clear the way for the state to use a map drawn up by three GOP-appointed judges.

After a decade of slow population growth, Mississippi must give up one of its five U.S. House seats.

Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia on Tuesday denied the appeal filed by attorney Robert McDuff of Jackson. McDuff wanted the court to order the state to use a congressional map drawn by Hinds County Chancery Judge Patricia Wise that was backed by Democrats. Scalia's denial came hours after three federal judges in Jackson ordered that the state use a map they drew. All three federal judges were appointed by Republicans.

McDuff immediately refiled his emergency appeal with Justice David H. Souter. The attorney said Souter can take up the appeal or, more likely, forward it to the full court.

He said he expected some word from the court either later this week or early next week.

No matter which plan is used, Rep. Chip Pickering, a Republican, and Rep. Ronnie Shows, a Democrat, will meet in a new consolidated district.

The federal judges' plan is thought to favor Pickering, while the rival plan was thought to favor Shows.

"We're obviously very pleased that the U.S. Supreme Court denied the emergency petition of the Democrats," said Grant Fox of Tupelo, an attorney who has represented Republicans in state and federal court redistricting fights.

McDuff said he also would ask the full Supreme Court to consider his appeal. He said it could be heard in the fall.

"This is obviously a setback," McDuff said.

Scalia handles emergency appeals from the 5th U.S. Circuit of Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas.

Scalia presided over Pickering's first swearing-in ceremony to Congress in 1997.

The justice also has spoken in Mississippi several times since the early 1990s. One trip in 1996 was arranged by Pickering's father, U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering, who is awaiting Senate action on his nomination to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Mississippi redistricting landed in the courts after state lawmakers were unable to agree on their own map. Democrats sued in chancery court and Republicans sued in federal court.

In ordering that their map be used, the three federal judges said it's unconstitutional for a chancery judge rather than the Legislature to draw a redistricting plan.

The federal judges said their plan would be used until the state produces a redistricting map that the Justice Department agrees is fair to minorities.

The federal judges' plan puts heavily Republican, suburban Jackson precincts in the new district where Pickering and Shows will face off.

Wise's plan puts those precincts in a district that dips down from northern Mississippi and gives the new district a higher concentration of black voters, who often vote Democratic.

Panel Grills Pa. Judge on Ethics

February 26, 2002 Tuesday

A Pennsylvania judge who is up for a promotion told senators Tuesday he did nothing unethical by temporarily overseeing a fraud case involving a bank where his wife worked.

U.S. District Judge D. Brooks Smith said during his confirmation hearing for the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia that he recused himself from the trial after a month because of the appearance, even though he wasn't required to.

"I wish I had recused myself earlier, but I did it because it was the right thing to do," Smith said.

Democrats and liberal groups have questioned Smith's qualifications for the court, which covers Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and the Virgin Islands. Some senators are worried about his chances in front of the Democratic-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee. "I'm just hoping they'll be fair when the time comes," said Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz.

Smith's supporters said his record is being distorted and he deserves to be on the higher court. "There is a lot of misinformation about him out there," Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., told the committee.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who sits on the committee, said, "I'm satisfied that Judge Smith has completely responded and answered any questions that have been raised."

It was not immediately known when the committee will vote on Smith.

The committee also delayed a planned Thursday confirmation vote for U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering of Mississippi, whose conservative record has brought criticism by liberal groups.

Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., said Tuesday he would join Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., in announcing publicly their intention to vote against Pickering. His "record as a judge clearly demonstrates that he is willing to put his own views above the law," Edwards said.

Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., asked the committee to give Pickering extra time to answer a "long list" of written questions submitted to him by senators after his second confirmation hearing.

It will be next week at the earliest before Pickering, who wants to be elevated to the 5th U.S. Circuit Appeals Court in New Orleans, is considered.

"Judge Pickering should have the opportunity to respond to the questions," Lott said.

Justice Department officials told the committee they expected Pickering to finish answering the questions before the day was out, a committee spokesman said. "There's been no indication from the White House or the Department of Justice that there would be any difficulty in Judge Pickering responding to the written questions," spokesman David Carle said.

Democrats questioned Smith, 50, for overseeing for a month in 1997 a fraud trial involving Mid-State Bank.

Smith's wife, Karen Smith, was the vice president of the lending department at Mid-State Bank at the time. The Smiths also held Mid-State stock.

Smith said Tuesday there was nothing at the outset of the case that indicated that Mid-State Bank would be involved, and there wasn't enough of a conflict later on to trigger an automatic disqualification.

"I was still satisfied ... there was no specific information that had been presented to me that was sufficient to suggest a basis for recusal," Smith said.

Smith issued several rulings before taking himself out of the trial, but the Justice Department cleared him of any wrongdoing.

Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., questioned Smith taking paid educational trips, saying Smith has taken more such trips than all but four judges in the nation. Feingold said the trips' total value was about $30,000, and some were to resort locations like Hilton Head Island, S.C.

Smith said the trips were purely education-related but he would not attend similar seminars if elevated to the appeals court unless he was sure it would not cause an appearance problem.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., threatened to filibuster Smith if he refused to answer questions because he might have to make a ruling on the issues later. Biden pointed out that in 1993 Smith talked about the Violence Against Women Act, which was going to be challenged in court, in front of the conservative Federalist Society.

"If you suggest to me that you cannot respond in the same way you responded as a sitting federal judge on the Violence Against Women Act, then I will do everything in my power to defeat you, including moving to the Senate floor to take an action I've never taken in my life as a United States senator, a filibuster," Biden said.

Biden left before Smith could respond. It was not immediately known whether Smith, like Pickering, would be required to come to a second hearing.

The Senate also confirmed two U.S. District Court judges on Tuesday: Cindy Jorgenson of Arizona and Robert Blackburn of Colorado. They were both confirmed by 98-0 votes.

U.S. Supreme Court denies Dems' initial redistricting appeal

A U.S. Supreme Court justice on Tuesday denied an emergency appeal filed by Democrats in Mississippi's congressional redistricting dispute, possibly clearing the way for the state to use a map drawn up by three GOP-appointed judges.

After a decade of slow population growth, Mississippi must give up one of its five U.S. House seats.

Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia denied the appeal filed by attorney Robert McDuff of Jackson. McDuff wanted the court to order the state to use a congressional map drawn by Hinds County Chancery Judge Patricia Wise that was backed by Democrats. Scalia handles emergency appeals from the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which includes Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas.

His denial came hours after three Republican-appointed federal judges in Jackson ordered that the state use a map they drew.

McDuff immediately refiled his emergency appeal with Justice David H. Souter. The attorney said Souter can take up the appeal or, more likely, forward it to the full Supreme Court.

McDuff said he expected some word from the court either later this week or early next week.

No matter which plan is used, the state's two junior congressmen - Republican Chip Pickering and Democrat Ronnie Shows - will meet in a new consolidated district.

The federal judges' plan is thought to favor Pickering, while the rival plan was thought to favor Shows.

Scalia presided over Pickering's first congressional swearing-in ceremony to Congress.

The justice also has spoken in Mississippi several times since the early 1990s. One trip in 1996 was arranged by Pickering's father, U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering, who is awaiting Senate action on his nomination to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Shows spokeswoman Cassie Sheldon would not comment on Scalia's connections to the Pickering family.

Speaking for Shows, she said of Scalia's denial of Democrats' initial appeal: "We're disappointed but we're not going to give up the fight for what's fair. We are going to run no matter what and we are going to win."

Chip Pickering's campaign manager, Henry Barbour, said Scalia has been hunting with Judge Pickering but the Pickerings' acquaintance with the justice has nothing to do with the redistricting case.

"This is an issue of the facts and the law," Barbour said. "If the other side wants to whine or complain, I think people are getting tired of that."

Barbour also said Chip Pickering plans to run "an aggressive, strong, grass-roots campaign."

During a budget hearing in Washington Tuesday, U.S. Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., gave Attorney General John Ashcroft a list of questions about the Justice Department, including its handling of Mississippi redistricting, said Leahy spokesman David Carle.

Leahy is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, where Judge Pickering's confirmation is pending.

Grant Fox of Tupelo, an attorney who has represented Republicans in state and federal court redistricting fights, said he expects the federal court's plan to be used in this year's elections.

"We're obviously very pleased that the U.S. Supreme Court denied the emergency petition of the Democrats," Fox said.

McDuff said he also will ask the full U.S. Supreme Court to consider more extensive arguments on Mississippi redistricting. He said those arguments could be heard in the fall.

"This is obviously a setback," McDuff said Tuesday. "We knew that an emergency application to the Supreme Court was an uphill ride and the hill has just gotten little steeper with this initial denial."

Congressional candidates' qualifying deadline is Friday. Primaries are June 4 and the general election is Nov. 5.

Mississippi redistricting bounced into the courts after state lawmakers were unable to agree on their own map. Democrats sued in chancery court and Republicans sued in federal court.

In ordering that their map be used, the three federal judges said it's unconstitutional for a chancery judge rather than the Legislature to draw a redistricting plan.

McDuff said previous court rulings from other states show the federal judges' ruling Tuesday is "totally wrong."

He said the state court didn't steal legislators' ability to draw a map.

"The Legislature dropped the ball and walked away," McDuff said.

The federal judges said their plan would be used until the state produces a redistricting map that the Justice Department agrees is fair to minorities.

The federal judges' plan puts heavily Republican, suburban Jackson precincts in the new central district where Pickering and Shows will face off.

Wise's plan puts those precincts in a district that dips down from northern Mississippi and gives the new central district a higher concentration of black voters, who often vote Democratic.

The three federal judges in Jackson said last week that they would order their plan to be used if the U.S. Justice Department by late Monday didn't approve Wise's map. That approval didn't come.

The Justice Department has been checking Wise's plan to ensure it's fair to minorities. The federal judges' plan does not need Justice clearance.

Pickering Defeat Looms as Democrats Hold to Tough Line

James W. Brosnan

The Commercial Appeal (Memphis, TN)

President Bush faces defeat for one of his judicial picks Thursday, when the Senate Judiciary Committee is scheduled to vote on the nomination of Mississippian Charles Pickering to the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

One Democrat, Dianne Feinstein of California, is predicting Pickering's defeat and that seems to be borne out in the tough line taken by Democrats, who hold a 10-9 majority, in written questions submitted to Pickering, a 64-year-old U.S. District Court judge, in the wake of two contentious hearings.

Sen. Herb Kohl (D-Wis.), who has been reticent about Pickering in public, asked the judge about his statement in a 1993 voting rights case that the one-person, one-vote doctrine might be "obtrusive" and give people "more government than they want." "What could be more important in this country than an equal right to vote?" wrote Kohl.

Several Democrats asked Pickering about a 1994 cross-burning case in which he forced Justice Department prosecutors to drop one charge against defendant Daniel Swan. Pickering did not want to sentence Swan to 7 years in prison as required by sentencing guidelines.

According to a memo from Linda Davis, head of the criminal section of the Justice Department's civil rights division, Pickering told prosecutors "that in the current racial climate in that part of the state, such a harsh sentence would serve only to divide the community."

Sen. Joe Biden (D-Del.) asked Pickering if the sentence would be more divisive "than the act of burning a cross on the lawn of a minority or mixed-race family."

In a letter sent to Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), Pickering said that unlike a 17-year-old co-defendant, who pled guilty and got probation, Swan had no history of racial violence.

"As repugnant as this crime was, I nevertheless felt this was the worst case of disparate sentencing that had come before me during my tenure on the bench," said Pickering.

He also said there was a split in the appellate courts about whether the most serious charge, use of a fire in commission of a felony, applied in cross-burning case.

"A Fair-Minded Judge"

Byron York
National Review
February 26, 2002

In a new twist in the battle over the nomination of Charles Pickering to a place on the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, a former top Clinton Justice Department official - who also happens to be former Vice President Al Gore's brother-in-law - has given the Senate Judiciary Committee a strong endorsement of Pickering's character.

The former official is Frank Hunger, who headed the Justice Department's Civil Division from 1993 until 1999. Like Pickering, Hunger is a Mississippian, and the two men have known each other for almost 30 years. Hunger is the man Pickering called in early 1995 when Pickering, a federal district judge in southern Mississippi, was trying to decide how to sentence a man convicted in a cross burning case. Pickering had become frustrated by the Justice Department's reluctance to answer questions about sentencing practices for similar crimes and complained to Hunger, who told him the problem was outside his area of responsibility. Democratic senator John Edwards, in a harsh interrogation at Pickering's February 7 confirmation hearing, accused Pickering of violating judicial ethics by calling Hunger. In a February 12 letter to committee chairman Patrick Leahy and ranking Republican Orrin Hatch, Hunger takes issue with those allegations. "I have little or no recollection of the call," Hunger writes. "The significance of this to me is had I felt at the time that there was anything inappropriate or improper about Judge Pickering's call I would most assuredly remember it today." Hunger says he has read Pickering's account of the matter and has "no reason whatsoever to take issue with anything he [Pickering] has said about the call."

Hunger's letter continues with an endorsement of Pickering as a judge and a man. "I have known Judge Pickering for nearly thirty years and have the utmost respect for him as a fair-minded judge who would never knowingly do anything improper or unethical," Hunger writes. "He is a person of great integrity, strong moral character, courage and compassion who treats all who come before him in a fair and dignified way." Hunger concludes by saying that Pickering has been "a distinguished judge and I think it most regrettable that his nomination has become controversial."

Despite the lift provided by Hunger's letter, there is increasing pessimism among Republicans about Pickering's chances. Many were deeply discouraged on Sunday after the appearance of Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein on NBC's Meet the Press, in which Feinstein declared her opposition to Pickering and said every Democrat on the committee agreed with her. "I believe that there's virtually unanimous opinion on the Democratic side of the Judiciary Committee that he will not be confirmed," Feinstein said. "In other words, he will not be voted out of the Judiciary Committee."

"So all ten Democrats will oppose him?" host Tim Russert asked.

"I believe so," Feinstein answered.

From a Republican perspective, what is even more disturbing than the fate of the Pickering nomination is the fear that Democrats are making good on threats to adopt a no-conservatives-allowed policy of evaluating nominations to the federal bench. "I've looked rather carefully at [Pickering's] background, and I think you have a person who has very strong right-wing views, both politically and personally," Feinstein said. "The question always comes: Can you put those views entirely aside? This is a lifetime appointment. If you can't be assured that the individual is really going to put those views aside, what happens is two years into the term those views creep forward again."

Finally, in the most disheartening development for Republicans, Feinstein returned to an argument against President Bush that Democrats have not used publicly in many months, certainly not since Sept. 11: the contention that the narrowness of Bush's victory in the 2000 election disqualifies him from appointing conservatives to the bench. "President Bush did not have a large mandate," Feinstein said. "There is no mandate, in my view, to skew the courts to the right. And so I think you're going to see a Judiciary Committee that's really going to be looking for mainstream judges, and those judges that they find outside of the mainstream I do not believe will have Democratic support."

A committee vote on Pickering is likely by March 7, but some key Republicans now believe Pickering's defeat is just a formality. "I still had hope until Sunday," said one GOP aide after watching Feinstein on Meet the Press. Now, that hope appears to be gone.

Unwarranted charges of racism

Stanley Kurtz

National Review

February 26, 2002, Tuesday

Racism is wrong. That's for certain. The trouble is, accusations of racism have also been turned into easily abused tools of personal destruction.

We've seen how opponents of Charles Pickering's appointment to the federal bench have tried to ruin him by pretending to discover in his judicial conservatism the taint of personal racism. Now a false charge of racism has brought a call for the dismissal of Candace de Russy, an outspoken trustee of the State University of New York, who dared to publicly criticize the SUNY system's African-American-studies programs for political bias and lack of rigor. The United University Professions, the 27,000-member union of faculty and staff at the SUNY system, has passed a resolution calling for de Russy's dismissal from the board. De Russy's crime was to be quoted in Newsday arguing that most black studies departments have become "flabby feel-good programs that carry an anti-American bias and do little to advance knowledge." De Russy happily concedes that there has been a good deal of distinguished African-American scholarship in recent years, pointing to the work of William Julius Wilson, for example. What bothers her is that black-studies departments have come under the control of professors with a single point of view, pushing students to come to predetermined political conclusions. The views of conservative black scholars such as Shelby Steele and Thomas Sowell, for example, are rarely presented.

Of course, the de Russy affair is only the latest in a long line of incidents in which open critics of black studies programs are tarred with charges of racism. Readers will recall the dust-up at Harvard over President Lawrence Summers's criticisms of Cornel West, but the problem has a much longer history. Last year, there were the attacks on the offices of student papers that had published the David Horowitz ad opposing slave reparations.

And remember the attempts to silence Harvey Mansfield's campaign against grade inflation at Harvard, simply because he argued that affirmative action played a role in promoting the practice? A lesser-known incident was the assault last November on Professor Barry Shain of Colgate University. Like de Russy, Shain had expressed concerns about black-studies courses that focused more on politically tinged consciousness raising than on mastery of a body of knowledge. And like de Russy, Shain was worried that such courses tempted students with easy grades for de facto group-therapy sessions. Seventy students, many of them black, occupied the Colgate admissions office and put their demands against Shain.

As with the de Russy flap, the real motive in the Shain affair was to destroy the one professor at Colgate who regularly shows the courage to criticize the plans and programs of a left-leaning faculty.

The list of such incidents and tactics can be extended indefinitely, going back to the origins of black-studies programs in the late sixties. At SUNY Stony Brook, for example, the black-studies program was instituted in 1968 after black students shut down the campus for days. The most famous incident of all was at Cornell in 1969, where black radicals armed with shotguns took over an administration building and threatened the lives of faculty who opposed their demands for, among other things, a program in black studies.

There can be no doubt that slavery and racism together constitute the most shameful chapter in American history. The study of that sad past, like the study of the struggles and positive achievements of black Americans, was unjustly neglected prior to the late sixties. But there is plenty of room for legitimate disagreement about the best way to integrate the study of minorities and women into the academic curriculum. The legacy of slavery and racism is tragic, real and important. Yet in the last 35 years, another disturbing legacy has taken root in the United States. It is the legacy of intimidation launched against any who dare to demur at the demands of organized minorities. We shall know that racism has finally been defeated in the United States when the "demands" of America's minorities can be subject to the same sort of rough and tumble criticism as the views of anyone else. In the meantime, we must do what we can to defend the freedom and integrity of brave souls like Barry Shain and Candace de Russy.

President to propose changes to welfare

EXCERPT

The Senate Judiciary Committee takes up two controversial judicial nominations this week.

The American Bar Association said D. Brooks Smith is qualified to be a judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia, but opponents say he wrongfully made rulings in a case in which he and his wife had a financial interest. Smith oversaw for a month a fraud trial in 1997 involving Mid-State Bank, which was accused of complicity in fraud. Smith's wife, Karen, was a bank officer. He also listed $ 100,000 to $ 250,000 of the bank's stock on his financial disclosure form. Smith later took himself off the case, and the Justice Department cleared him of wrongdoing.

Later this week, the committee is scheduled to vote on Charles Pickering for a seat on the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans. Opponents say he is hostile to civil right issues. Supporters say he testified against the Ku Klux Klan in Mississippi and has worked at racial reconciliation in the state.

More Questions for Pickering With confirmation vote looming, senators have new queries for 5th Circuit nominee.

Legal Times
February 25, 2002

With a Senate Judiciary Committee vote on Charles Pickering Sr. slated for Feb. 28, the appeals court nominee appears to be headed for a narrow party-line rejection, Senate observers say.

In their last chance to screen Pickering, several senators have submitted written questions for the district judge from Mississippi to answer before the vote. Nothing in the questions seems likely to arouse hopes among Pickering's backers that a Democrat or two would cross party lines and support him.

At a Feb. 7 hearing, Democrats, who hold a 10-9 edge on the committee, queried Pickering intensively about his views on racial issues, his rulings as a trial judge, and his views on the Constitution and the right to privacy. The vast majority of the written questions came from Democrats with serious reservations about Pickering's nomination. The queries track many of the issues raised at the hearing, but some new allegations also emerged.

Sen. Herb Kohl of Wisconsin, the only Democrat who did not attend the Feb. 7 hearing, posed six questions that suggest Kohl shares many of his colleagues' concerns.

Kohl cited a Pickering voting rights decision from 1993 in which the judge expressed doubt about whether federal law requires drawing lines that divide towns and communities in order to equalize the population of voting districts. He concluded in Fairley v. Forrest County that he was "bound to follow the precedents established by prior controlling judicial decisions."

But he also wondered "if we are not giving the people more government than they want and more than is required in defining one-man, one-vote too precisely."

Commenting on this language, Kohl asked, "What could be more important in this country than an equal right to vote?"

Pickering, with the help of officials at the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy, has sent in some written responses. But Mimi Devlin, a committee spokeswoman, says Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) will not release the replies until all have been received.

Pickering declines comment. On his behalf, Justice Department Director of Public Affairs Barbara Comstock says, "Judge Pickering takes the inquiries of the Senate Judiciary Committee very seriously and is working diligently to provide them with thorough and accurate responses as quickly as possible."

Both Kohl and Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) asked about Pickering's support in 1974 of a resolution asking Congress to repeal the Occupational Safety and Health Act. Pickering was then a state senator in Mississippi.

According to Kohl and Kennedy, the resolution referred to OSHA as "ridiculous, outrageous, and wasteful" and assailed the act as unduly burdensome to business.

"Do you still hold those views about OSHA?" Kohl asked. "Do your views expressed toward OSHA demonstrate your thoughts generally about the role of the federal government in issues concerning worker safety?"

Though Pickering's written response was not available at press time, a Department of Justice official rejects the implication that Pickering is opposed to OSHA enforcement.

"Thirty years after OSHA was first passed, Judge Pickering believes that the federal government has an important role to play in ensuring the safety of America's workers," the official says. "As a practicing lawyer in the 1980s, Judge Pickering remembers using OSHA regulations and standards to protect the rights of workers."

Adds the official: "It is the responsibility of federal judges to enforce statutory enactments. The judge did so as a district court judge and intends to do so as a circuit court judge, if given the opportunity."

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), the lone Judiciary Committee Democrat to support the nomination of Attorney General John Ashcroft, questioned why Judge Pickering dismissed a number of pro se cases filed by federal prisoners as frivolous and threatened to impose sanctions against the prisoners.

The senator pointed out that a 1996 law specified two types of sanctions against prisoners' frivolous claims. He queried why Pickering authorized other sanctions-such as ordering prison officials to restrict the inmate's prison privileges-without citing any basis in federal law.

"On what specific legal authority were you relying when you threatened to impose these sanctions?" Feingold asked.

The only Republican to ask questions was Sen. Jeff Sessions of Alabama, whose queries were framed in broad terms, unlike the confrontational tone that many Democrats adopted.

"Please describe your views on the availability of habeas corpus relief to prisoners," Sessions asked.

While Pickering appears to lack support from any committee Democrats, some observers speculate that Leahy may agree to send the nomination to the Senate floor with a negative recommendation rather than bottle it up in committee.

Pickering has strong support from Minority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.), and at least two Democrats in the closely divided Senate-Ernest Hollings of South Carolina and Zell Miller of Georgia-have said that they would vote to confirm Pickering if his name reached the floor.

Members of Leahy's staff declined comment on whether Pickering's name would get out of committee if he is voted down. Ron Bonjean, Lott's press secretary, declines comment.

Pickering Battles Face Decisions on Two Fronts

Paul Kane

Roll Call

February 25, 2002

With charges and countercharges flying from Mississippi to Capitol Hill, the father-son duo of U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering and Rep. Chip Pickering (R-Miss.) may face their respective political days of reckoning this week.

In decisions that will have ripple effects throughout all three branches of the federal government, the Pickerings are engaged in racially charged fights, with interest groups on both sides mounting furious campaigns.

Judge Pickering, seeking an elevation to the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, has faced a nearly endless volley of charges that he has been racially insensitive as a state politician and on the federal bench. The Senate Judiciary Committee is tentatively slated to vote on Pickering Thursday, with his nomination desperately in need of support from one Democrat on the panel to gain a vote on the Senate floor. Rep. Pickering is facing a redistricting battle that will pit him against Rep. Ronnie Shows (D-Miss.) in the fall, but a legal fight between state and federal courts has not yet resolved the precise shape of the new district. If the Justice Department does not sign off on a state-backed plan by today, a three-judge federal panel has said it will impose its own district - which is much more favorable to Chip Pickering because of its lower percentage of voting-age black residents - by tomorrow, in time for the March 1 filing deadline.

While the two cases are seemingly independent of each other, the cast of characters waging fights over the Pickerings' futures are virtually the same, and each side has made vague allegations against the other about linking the two battles for its own advantage.

Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), who has been the most outspoken Congressional Black Caucus opponent of Judge Pickering's and the CBC leader in the redistricting fight, went to great lengths to note that the redistricting plan favoring Republicans was designed by three GOP-nominated judges. One of the three, U.S. District Judge Henry Wingate, wrote a letter to the Judiciary Committee in support of Judge Pickering's nomination, and another, District Judge David Bramlett, serves with Wingate and Pickering on the same federal court.

"And now they craft a plan that's more favorable to their colleague's son than the [state-backed plan] that's under review by the Justice Department," Thompson said, adding that it's not too far a stretch to say the judges are seeking retribution for Democratic opposition to the judicial nomination. "It certainly could be made to [look] that way."

Rep. Pickering, who has been the most outspoken supporter on behalf of his father's nomination, has argued just the opposite, that Congressional Democrats are holding up Judge Pickering's nomination as leverage in the redistricting battle.

The nomination fight has become a pivotal one in the Senate, with Minority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.) - a friend of Judge Pickering's for 30 years and former boss of Rep. Pickering - vowing retribution if Democrats defeat the judicial nomination. Some Senate Republicans have even talked of holding up all legislative matters through parliamentary tactics, freezing the Senate floor, if the Pickering nomination goes down, according to aides.

But interest groups from the People for the American Way to the NAACP have ratcheted up the pressure on Judiciary Democrats, arguing that Pickering's record as a state Senator and federal judge is replete with insensitivity to civil rights.

According to one aide to a Judiciary Democrat, the anti-Pickering coalition began a fax, phone and e-mail campaign Thursday, with form letters from across Texas, Louisiana and Mississippi accusing Pickering of "insensitive and extreme views."

Despite favorable stories in the national press about home-state support for Pickering among blacks, the coalition is arguing that those supporters only know Pickering as a person, not as a judge. "We're not looking into his heart, we're looking into his record," said Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way.

Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) has scheduled a business meeting to vote on nominations Thursday, when it is "likely" Pickering's nomination will be handled, according to David Carle, Leahy's spokesman.

Aides and observers noted that a decision to hold a vote so quickly after the return from the Presidents' Day recess does not bode well for Pickering's chances. But, Carle stressed, "No final agenda [for the hearing] will be set until closer to Thursday."

By that time, Rep. Pickering's future may already be virtually certain. The Justice Department, under the Voting Rights Act, must approve any redistricting plan in Mississippi, and originally faced a deadline today for approving or rejecting the state-backed plan. But two weeks ago Justice's Civil Rights Division requested more information from Mississippi regarding its plan, which would leave a Pickering-Shows district with 37 percent of the voting-age population being African-American.

Justice thus created a new 60-day deadline for later in the spring, but the filing deadline for candidates continues to be March 1. The three-judge panel, however, has drawn up its own district - 30 percent African-American - and said that redistricting must be in place by the filing deadline, requiring the federal map to be imposed Tuesday if Justice does not clear the state-backed plan by today.

Thompson, Shows and Mississippi Democrats have accused Justice of intentionally delaying its decisions on the state plan to guarantee that the map more favorable to the GOP would be imposed by the federal court.

If the redistricting fight isn't connected to the judicial battle, it is, at a minimum, dirty politics, they contend. "I have never seen such blatant political manipulation. Instead of enforcing the Voting Rights Act, they are carrying the water of Chip Pickering," said Rob McDuff, a Democratic attorney from Jackson, Miss.

Democrats fear that a district with only a 30 percent African-American voting population may not even be competitive for Shows, whose current district has a population of 43 percent black voters.

Republicans contend that the plan violates the civil rights laws because it was written up by a local judge, an African-American voted into office as an independent from an overwhelmingly Democratic region. A local judge should not be drawing up a statewide Congressional map, Republicans contend, an allegation Justice has been inclined to listen to so far. "That's something that has never been done before," said Dan Nelson, a department spokesman.

Nelson said the various political scenarios will not be a factor in the decision, but he couldn't guarantee a decision will come in time to avoid the federal judges' takeover of the redistricting process.

Judge Defends Ethics in Handling of Case

The Commercial Appeal (Memphis, TN)

February 27, 2002 Wednesday

A Pennsylvania judge who is up for a promotion told senators Tuesday he did nothing unethical by temporarily overseeing a fraud case involving a bank where his wife worked.

U.S. Dist. Judge D. Brooks Smith said during his confirmation hearing for the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia that he recused himself from the trial after a month because of the appearance of conflict of interest, even though he wasn't required to.

"I wish I had recused myself earlier, but I did it because it was the right thing to do," Smith said.

Democrats and liberal groups have questioned Smith's qualifications for the court, which covers Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and the Virgin Islands. Some senators are worried about his chances in front of the Democratic-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee.

"I'm just hoping they'll be fair when the time comes," said Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.).

It was not immediately known when the committee will vote on Smith.

Democrats questioned Smith, 50, for overseeing for a month in 1997 a fraud trial involving Mid-State Bank.

Smith's wife, Karen Smith, was vice president of the lending department at Mid-State Bank at the time. The Smiths also held Mid-State stock.

Smith said there was nothing at the outset of the case that indicated that Mid-State Bank would be involved.

"I was still satisfied . . . there was no specific information that had been presented to me that was sufficient to suggest a basis for recusal," Smith said.

Judge wins Senate approval

The Denver Post

February 27, 2002 Wednesday

EXCERPT

The U.S. Senate on Tuesday voted 98-0 to approve Robert Blackburn's nomination to serve as a judge on the U.S. District Court in Colorado.

Blackburn, 51, of Las Animas was appointed as a state district judge in Bent County in 1988. He practiced law for 13 years before that. He earned his law degree at the University of Colorado.

He will be sworn in sometime in April, said Sean Conway, spokesman for Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo.

Enviros Criticize Third Judicial Nomination, Two others; Head to Senate

Brian Stempeck

Greenwire

February 27, 2002

As two controversial appeals court nominations head before the Senate Judiciary Committee this week, environmental groups are raising concerns about President Bush's nomination for the U.S. Court of Federal Claims. Bush's pick is an extremist when it comes to decisions related to the Fifth Amendment's takings clause, according to the groups, though property rights advocates say the nominee actually holds moderate views.

In a letter to Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), 23 environmental groups, including Defenders of Wildlife, American Rivers and Friends of the Earth, expressed concerns about Lawrence Block, nominated to the Court of Federal Claims. The court is almost solely responsible for many takings decisions, said Glenn Sugameli, senior legislative counsel for the Earthjustice Legal Defense Fund, another of the groups involved in the letter. Property owners often argue a 'taking' occurs when a government regulation or seizure causes a major loss in revenue or development ability, though there is no set rule for what constitutes a taking. Conservation groups worry that changing definitions of takings would force state and federal governments to pay landowners for meeting environmental standards. "Mr. Block's record and his answers to the Senate Judiciary Committee Questionnaire for Judicial Nominees suggest... that he would apply an extreme approach to takings law that would conflict with unanimous Supreme Court rulings," the groups said in the letter. "An ultra-conservative interpretation of the Takings Clause could be extremely damaging, redefining property rights at the expense of neighboring property, public health, and the environment. Federal Claims Court rulings could require that taxpayers fund prohibitively expensive windfall payments to property owners who obey pollution-control and other laws. The cost of these payments would chill enforcement and implementation of a wide array of laws that protect the American people."

Sugameli called Block a "very strong, outspoken advocate of expansive private property takings provisions." As senior counsel to former Judiciary Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), Block worked on a bill backed by the National Home Builders Association, said Sugameli. That bill "would have changed the standards and procedures for takings claims against local governments," he said, and if passed, would have been "a hammer to the head of local officials."

Sugameli said he fears Block would not follow precedents, based on strong opinions he has put forth in personal statements, during his time with Hatch, and in the nominees questionnaire. "The problem is he either is unable to tell what precedent is or unwilling to admit it," said Sugameli.

But conservative groups say Earthjustice and the others are exaggerating Block's record. Chuck Cushman, executive director of the American Land Rights Association, said he didn't think the Bush administration would nominate an extremist to any court. "They don't have a record of appointing extremists to anything," he said. Environmentalist claims accusing Block of extremism are "nonsense," said Cushman. "I don't have any sense of that at all."

Cushman said he had spoken to Block on a number of occasions when Block was with Hatch and called constituents. "I have a sense of his views on some of these things," said Cushman. "He sounds like a pretty moderate guy to me."

Other conservative groups similarly supported Block. "What I find shocking about those environmentalists who oppose property rights is how little they understand the issue," said Roger Pilan, vice president of legal affairs for the Cato Institute. "They don't seem to appreciate that environmentalism is rooted in property rights theory. The whole of nuisance law -- which is environmentalism writ small -- is about protecting the rights of some property owners from the abuses that might follow from the uses that other owners of their property. Property rights constitute the foundation of environmental protection," he added.

PICKERING, BROOKS GO BEFORE SENATE

Though Block will not go before the Senate Judiciary Committee for several weeks, two other controversial appeals court nominations are slated for review this week.

Judge Charles Pickering, the Bush administration's pick for the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, goes before the committee Thursday. Pickering has a history of denying citizens access to federal courts, according to Earthjustice, such as when he dismissed "claims filed by victims in toxic tort cases concerning an EPA Superfund site." The real controversy surrounding Pickering, however, is related to his civil rights record, which could prevent his passage. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said on NBC's "Meet the Press" that the 10 Democrats on the committee will oppose Pickering's nomination.

Environmental groups have also criticized Judge D. Brooks Smith, nominated to the Third Circuit Court of Appeals, saying he is lax on punishing polluters (Greenwire, Feb. 14).

But similar to Pickering's situation, other aspects of Smith's background may prevent his affirmation. In 1997, Smith presided over an investment fraud case for nearly a month, without revealing that his wife and he had a financial interest in the case, as was reported in the Washington Post and other papers. Smith appeared before the committee yesterday and was questioned on the fraud case and his views opposing the Violence Against Women Act, according to David Carle, press secretary to Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.). A vote on Smith's confirmation has not yet been scheduled, he said.

Lott gains a delay on vote for Bush judicial nominee; Postponement gives GOP time to counter criticism

Michael Petrocelli
The Houston Chronicle
February 27, 2002, Wednesday

WASHINGTON - Scrambling to salvage President Bush's nominee to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Senate Republican leader Trent Lott won a delay Tuesday on a critical vote by the Democrat-controlled Judiciary Committee.

The committee - which must clear all judicial nominations before they reach the full Senate - had been scheduled to vote Thursday on the nomination of Charles Pickering, but committee chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., pushed the vote back to next week.

David Carle, a spokesman for Leahy, said the chairman agreed to postpone the vote "as a courtesy" to Lott, a Mississippi Republican.

Pickering's nomination to fill a vacant seat on the 5th Circuit, which includes Texas, Louisiana and Mississippi, has been embroiled in questions about his record on race relations and abortion rights. The nomination of Pickering, 64, who currently is a federal judge in Mississippi, is the first of what is expected to be a number of tough confirmation fights for Bush judicial nominees.

A Pennsylvania judge who is up for another appeals court seat told senators Tuesday that he did nothing unethical while overseeing a fraud case involving a bank where his wife worked. Democrats and liberal groups have questioned U.S. District Judge D. Brooks Smith's qualifications for the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia.

Democrats questioned Smith, 50, about his waiting a month before stepping down from a 1997 fraud trial involving a bank at which his wife was vice president of the lending department. The judge and his wife also owned stock in the bank.

Tuesday's postponement of the vote on Pickering gives Lott and fellow Republicans another week to counter growing criticism of the nomination, but it may only delay an inevitable rejection by the Judiciary Committee or the Senate.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., a member of the committee, predicted Sunday on NBC's Meet the Press that Pickering's nomination would not make it to the Senate floor.

"I believe that there's virtually unanimous opinion on the Democratic side of the Judiciary Committee that he will not be confirmed. In other words he will not be voted out of the Judiciary Committee," she said.

Democrats hold a 10-9 advantage on the committee.

White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said Bush will fight to get Pickering confirmed. "The president continues to have every bit of confidence in Judge Pickering and will continue to support him and urge his passage," Fleischer said.

"I think what you're seeing is an unfortunate part of the politicization of the way judges, circuit court judges are picked in this country," he said.

A spokesman said Lott asked for the delay to give Pickering time to respond to questions submitted last week by Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., a member of the committee.

The announcement of the delay came on the same day a group of activists from Texas was making the rounds on Capitol Hill, urging Senators to reject Pickering.

The confirmation fight has revisited chapters from Mississippi's resistance to racial integration.

Pickering's supporters have sought to portray him as a courageous proponent of civil rights, while his opponents have painted him as a barely-reconstructed segregationist.

The NAACP has challenged Pickering on an article he wrote in 1959 as a University of Mississippi law student, encouraging tougher laws against interracial marriage. He also has drawn criticism for his contacts with the Mississippi Sovereignty Commission, a state agency that was created to help maintain segregation.

During Judiciary Committee hearings into his nomination, Pickering acknowledged that in a case before his court in 1994, he opposed a mandatory five-year sentence for a man convicted of burning a cross on the lawn of an interracial couple. The judge also acknowledged contacting a Justice Department official urging prosecutors to agree to a lighter sentence than required by law.

Pickering's supporters have pointed to the fact that in 1967, as a county attorney in Laurel, Miss., he testified against a Ku Klux Klan leader on trial for the murder of a civil rights leader. Doing so cost him his re-election, they say, and put him in physical danger in a town with many people sympathetic to the Klan.

John Wagner

The News and Observer (Raleigh, NC)

February 27, 2002 Wednesday

Washington -- U.S. Sen. John Edwards on Tuesday formally outlined his objections to elevating a Mississippi judge to a federal appeals court, contending that President Bush's nominee would "put his own views above the law."

Edwards, a North Carolina Democrat, was among the most aggressive questioners earlier this month when Judge Charles Pickering appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee for his confirmation hearing. Bush has nominated Pickering, a U.S. District Court judge, to a seat on the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

During the hearing, Edwards strongly implied that Pickering had acted inappropriately in a 1994 case that involved a cross-burning on the lawn of an interracial couple. Several days later, Edwards touted his tough posture during a political appearance in California that was designed to showcase him as a potential 2004 presidential candidate. Although Edwards' questioning of Pickering drew praise from Democratic leaders, his tactics were heavily criticized by Richard "Dickie" Scruggs, a well-known Democratic trial lawyer from Mississippi, who said Edwards badly distorted Pickering's record.

Edwards also drew fire from conservatives, with The Wall Street Journal accusing him of "race-baiting to liberal crowds" in an editorial Tuesday. "This is a man who wants to be President," the editorial stated.

On Tuesday, Edwards released statements from three law school professors, all of whom concluded Pickering acted inappropriately in the 1994 case.

During his questioning at the hearing, Edwards implied that Pickering violated a judicial code of conduct, first by meeting privately with one side of the case and then by intervening at the U.S. Justice Department.

Pickering maintained that he was merely expressing frustration at a situation in which prosecutors had gone easy on the main culprit in exchange for a guilty plea but come down much harder on a lesser player.

The three law professors who backed up Edwards on Tuesday were Stephen Gillers of New York University, John Leubsdorf of Rutgers University and Stephen Lubet of Northwestern University.

In his statement Tuesday, Edwards also noted that Pickering's rulings in other cases have been reversed 15 times by the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for his failure to follow "well-established principles of law."

Pickering's supporters maintain that such a figure is not unusual, given that he has issued thousands of opinions during his tenure.

The confirmation of Pickering has become a highly partisan fight between Senate Democrats and President Bush. Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, a Mississippi Republican, is a staunch supporter of Pickering and has threatened to retaliate against Democrats if Pickering is not confirmed.

The Judiciary Committee had scheduled a vote on Pickering's nomination Thursday, but it now appears the vote will be put off at least until next week. Some Democrats on the committee have predicted that Pickering's nomination will not be cleared by the panel.

In his statement, Edwards also noted that he has voted to confirm all 38 other individuals nominated by President Bush for federal judgeships.

That total, however, does not include Judge Terrence Boyle of North Carolina, whom Bush has nominated to the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Edwards has blocked Boyle from receiving a confirmation hearing as part of a long-running feud with U.S. Sen. Jesse Helms over nominees from North Carolina.

Another confirmation fight is brewing, with Democrats expressing concern about a fraud case involving a bank where the nominee's wife worked.

Judge D. Brooks Smith, who temporarily oversaw the case, said he recused himself a month into the trial even though he didn't have to. Smith is up for a position on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and the Virgin Islands.

Thornburgh Fails to Make Case Against Judge's Critics

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

February 27, 2002 Wednesday

Lawyers know judges professionally better than anyone else. Yet if you're a reporter profiling a judge, and you go in search of lawyers who will make on-the-record comments, two things are bound to happen:

Those with positive things to say will be glad to say them for attribution, and those with critical opinions will either keep their mouths shut or speak only on condition that they not be identified, which means their quotes are unlikely to appear.

Newspapers, by and large, are loath to publish anonymous quotes, with good reason. It's too easy to take potshots for which one cannot be held accountable. But the lack of counterbalance has a tendency to skew judicial profiles in the judges' favor. If, for example, I were doing a piece on Allegheny County Common Pleas Judge Patrick McFalls, and I went out today in search of lawyers' input, I'd have no problem getting anecdotes about his good humor and great storytelling. But if I asked about judges getting drunk and taking off their pants in neighborhood bars, I'd be hard-pressed to get a single disapproval on the record.

This kind of reticence is a simple fact of self-preservation. No lawyers in their right minds are going to antagonize the very people who determine the fates of their cases, clients and careers.

Sucking up, on the other hand, never hurts.

Objection, your honor! No fair characterizing lawyers as suck-ups just because they happen to sincerely like a judge or truly believe that she or he is fair, honorable and upright.

OK, withdrawn. Such wholesale damnation is out of bounds.

By the same token, given that lawyers don't feel safe in going public with negative comments about a judicial nominee, it is every bit as out of bounds to dismiss all criticism from other organizations as the illegitimate ravings of "extreme interest groups."

Yet that is what Dick Thornburgh did this week in his op-ed defense of D. Brooks Smith, the chief judge of U.S. District Court here whose nomination to the 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals is drawing some opposition fire.

Thornburgh, who entered politics as a moderate Republican and then grew increasingly conservative during his tenure as Ronald Reagan's and George Bush's attorney general, used the phrase "extreme interest groups" not once but three times in attacking Smith's critics.

How convenient for him that these groups -- extreme or not -- were the only ones in a position to publicly raise questions about Smith's propensity for luxury trips paid for by corporate sponsors, and his failure to immediately recuse himself from the John Gardner Black fraud case involving the bank where his wife was a vice president.

These are legitimate areas of inquiry. And given the array of accolades heaped upon Smith by Republicans and Democrats alike, you wouldn't think that a closer look would be seen as so outrageously partisan.

Because Thornburgh was a trustee of the defrauded school districts in the Black case, he was in a unique position to give his opinion of the judge's actions in that case. He should have stopped there. But the old pol just couldn't resist piling on.

Ah well, give him this much: At long last, the former attorney general has found a reason to come out against partisan critics of a president's judicial picks.

Too bad he didn't feel the need to speak up in defense of Democrats John Binger and Lynette Norton. Both are highly regarded and highly qualified lawyers from Pittsburgh. Both were nominated -- twice -- to the federal bench by President Clinton. Both were blocked by Republican Sen. Rick Santorum in a bare-knuckle act of political aggression.

But while Little Ricky was crossing his arms and taunting the president with the equivalent of "Bil-ly, you've got some 'splainin' to do!" Thornburgh never wrote a single op-ed piece defending Binger or Norton, or lamenting the undue harm that Santorum's partisanship was inflicting on the grossly understaffed district court in this region.

Now that the nominee is a Republican with longtime ties to Thornburgh, the ex-AG has suddenly gotten religion on this matter. But his criticism of Smith's opponents would carry a lot more weight if, when the chips were down for two well-regarded Democratic nominees, he'd stood up to Santorum, an extreme interest group of one.

aspects of U.S. District Judge D. Brooks Smith's handling of the John Gardner Black investment fraud case, a subject of Smith's confirmation hearing in the Senate yesterday.

The controversy has to do with whether Smith recused himself quickly enough after it became clear that Mid-State Bank, where his wife was an officer and where he and his wife had invested more than $100,000, might have helped Black hide losses from investments he managed for dozens of Pennsylvania school districts and a handful of municipalities. The Securities and Exchange Commission sued Black Sept. 26, 1997, and was granted a temporary restraining order freezing all assets in question. A month later, at the request of the SEC and court-appointed trustee Dick Thornburgh, Smith allowed investors access to half of their assets, pending a final resolution as to how much each district was owed.

In doing so, Smith continued to treat similarly those districts whose assets sat in a pooled account at Mid-State Bank, where most of the investment losses occurred, and those whose assets were placed elsewhere and had not incurred heavy losses. The Feb. 20 story described this as Smith "pooling" the assets of all districts but might more accurately have described it as continuing to pool their losses, just as the original freeze had done.

The story went on to point out that Smith's ruling did not stand, suggesting that U.S. District Judge Donetta Ambrose, who took over the case after Smith recused himself, found fault with Smith's October order. In fact, Ambrose approved his order in December.

It was not until five months later, after receiving new information on remaining assets and a flurry of legal briefs, that Ambrose rearranged the case. She ruled that the districts whose assets had not been pooled at Mid-State be given access to all their holdings. Those who suffered losses in the pooled account at Mid-State would get 90 percent of their share of the assets that remained.

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld her decision in December 1998 and said the non-pooled assets should not have been frozen. Therefore, while Smith's ruling did not ultimately stand, it was initially upheld and altered only after the case had progressed.

Altoona Judge Fails to Satisfy Biden's Concerns; Lack of Candidness Could Spur Filibuster

Ann McFeatters
Pittsburgh Post-Gazette
February 27, 2002 Wednesday

District Court Judge D. Brooks Smith of Altoona, fighting hard to win Senate confirmation as President Bush's nominee for the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, still faces a barrage of questions from Sen. Joseph Biden, who warned yesterday that he would filibuster against the judge on the Senate floor if Smith were not "candid" in his replies.

Time ran out at yesterday's hearing for Smith before the Senate Judiciary Committee, as several senators who said they still had questions for the nominee had to hasten to the floor for votes. Smith's hearing finally was adjourned when Biden, D-Del., was delayed, and Smith was told that he would get a batch of written questions next Tuesday. But the impact of answers to written questions is rarely as great as an open hearing's give-and-take between lawmakers and witnesses. Pennsylvania's two Republican senators, Arlen Specter and Rick Santorum, both spoke strongly on behalf of Smith, 50, whom President Ronald Reagan named to the District Court in 1988, when the nominee was 36. Santorum said Smith has "incredible support" from an "incredible array" of people," including 17 members of Congress. He said "national interest groups" -- representing environmental, civil rights and women's issues -- were "weighing in" to try to discredit the judge.

Smith was accompanied by a phalanx of supporters, including nearly a dozen lawyers. Among the group were Timothy Lewis, a former 3rd Circuit judge who returned to private practice in 1999, quitting the seat that Smith has been nominated to fill; Duquesne University law professor Ken Gormley; and Reps. Melissa Hart, R-Bradford Woods, and William Coyne, D-Oakland.

The concerns raised yesterday over Smith's nomination were from Democrats and focused on three areas: His legal seminar attendance at resorts, judicial philosophy and his delay in recusing himself in a controversial case.

Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., characterized the 12 seminars at resorts around the country that Smith attended as intended to influence judges in cases affecting large corporations. Feingold said only four other federal judges have attended more such seminars.

Smith responded that it is his job to hear "different points of view on a daily basis; it's what we're about. I can hear these points of view without being influenced."

When Feingold asked why Smith hadn't reported the seminars' value, which were estimated to be worth about $30,000, the judge said it was his understanding that he didn't have to. He said he had made "more than one phone call" to try to discover the seminars' funding and learned that they came from 'dead men's [foundation] money.' "

When Feingold noted that Bethlehem Steel had been a sponsor of at least one and that Smith had presided in several cases involving that company, the judge said he hadn't been aware of that sponsorship. But Smith sought to assure the committee that in the future, "until I can be satisfied that funding is not a problem, I won't attend" such seminars.

Biden asked about a 1993 speech that Smith gave to the Pittsburgh Federalist Society, in which Smith raised constitutional questions about the Violence Against Women Act. The measure, which the senator had sponsored, gave women the right to seek federal court redress under civil rights laws. The Supreme Court later struck down part of the law.

In his speech, Smith had laid out a view of federalism asserting that if the Constitution doesn't specifically grant a power to the federal government, Congress can't pass a law dealing with it. Some critics suggest that if such a view were to prevail on the federal bench, it would negate many civil rights and environmental laws.

Biden said he accepted Specter's word that Smith has the temperament and character for the appellate job, but he still had other questions for Smith. Biden said that if he felt Smith were not being candid or advanced the argument that he couldn't discuss issues that might come before him, "I'll filibuster on the floor of the Senate" to defeat Smith, even though he had "never taken that step in my life." Biden and Smith appeared to differ sharply in their view of states rights vs. federal rights.

Several senators asked Smith why he hadn't recused himself sooner in a case involving a U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission's suit against former Altoona investor J. Gardner Black, now serving 41 months in jail for defrauding 75 school districts through risky investments. Black's bank, Mid-State, which employed Smith's wife and in which the couple had at least $100,000 of stock, was involved in the case, though not a direct party. Still, the bank later had to pay a settlement of $51 million to the districts.

Because it was not a party to the suit, Smith said, he saw no sufficient reason to recuse himself under federal law until he saw a report by Dick Thornburgh, the case's trustee and a former Pennsylvania governor and U.S. attorney general. Thornburgh said the bank might be more involved in the case than it had seemed at first. Smith said he had issued rulings in the case for a month, some of which seemed to favor the bank, "with the belief that Mid-State Bank was nothing more than a depository."

Four days after receiving Thornburgh's report, he recused himself, citing his wife's employment but not his own financial interest. The law does not require judges to give a reason for stepping aside.

Later, Smith also presided for about five months in a criminal case the federal government brought against Black until the defendant himself requested that the judge recuse himself.

Smith's supporters maintain that he acted properly. But under continued Feingold questioning, Smith himself said, "With the benefit of hindsight, I wish I had recused earlier."

Specter noted that of 5,298 cases Smith has handled as a federal judge, only 526 were appealed and 53 reversed -- just about a 10 percent reversal rate. That, he said approvingly, is less than the 11.7 percent rate for the 3rd Circuit as a whole.

Judge Defends Role In Seminars, Bank; Senators Question Appellate Nominee

Edward Walsh
The Washington Post
February 27, 2002, Wednesday

U.S. District Judge D. Brooks Smith defended himself before the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday as Democratic senators questioned his expense-paid attendance at legal seminars sponsored by conservative groups and his handling of a 1997 case that involved a bank where his wife worked and in which he had a substantial financial interest.

Smith, who has been nominated by President Bush for a seat on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, said the seminars were "educational" but had not influenced his judicial views. "Judges are accustomed to hearing different points of view," he said. "It's what we do." Defending his decision to preside over the 1997 case for a month before he removed himself, Smith said he did not think at the outset of the proceeding that Mid-State Bank of Altoona, Pa., was anything more than the "depository" for funds that an investment adviser was accused of defrauding from several school districts in western Pennsylvania.

But after a while, Smith said, he "became uneasy" about the bank's role in the case and recused himself, citing his wife's job. He said he did not disclose his financial interest in the bank because he did not consider the bank to be financially liable in the case.

Smith's wife, Karen, was a vice president of Mid-State at the time. The couple jointly owned at least $ 100,000 in stock in a holding company that controlled the bank.

While most of the questions at yesterday's hearing concerned Smith's travels to the seminars and the 1997 fraud case, the most serious threat to his nomination was voiced by Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.).

Biden said he was most concerned about Smith's "judicial philosophy" and warned the judge that if he attempted to duck questions by saying that the issues might come before him on the circuit court, "I will do everything I can to defeat you," including resort to a filibuster.

But during the 10 minutes allotted to him, Biden asked only one question, then left the hearing room before Smith could answer and did not return for a second round of questioning.

Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) said that between 1992 and 2000, Smith attended 12 seminars sponsored by the Foundation for Research on Economics and the Environment and George Mason University's Law and Economics Center, which espouse conservative legal views and paid about $ 30,000 to cover Smith's expenses.

Smith said he would not attend such seminars again unless he were satisfied that funding for groups sponsoring them did not come from corporations or others who had issues before his court.

Smith, 50, chief judge of the U.S. District Court for Western Pennsylvania, has come under fire from several liberal groups that accused him of too often siding with "powerful interests" while neglecting "the rights and needs of ordinary Americans." The groups have cited a 1993 speech Smith gave to the Federalist Society of Pittsburgh that assailed the constitutionality of the Violence Against Women Act, a portion of which was later struck down by the Supreme Court. Smith said yesterday that he was "absolutely committed to adhering" to the portions of the law that were not struck down.

Republicans on the committee defended Smith throughout the questioning, which Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) said was inspired by "the usual liberal lobbyists and interest groups in Washington."

Meanwhile yesterday, the committee postponed for a week a vote on the nomination of U.S. District Judge Charles W. Pickering to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

2nd judicial nominee hit in Senate; Democrats criticize Smith; GOP cries foul over 'pattern'

Audrey Hudson
The Washington Times
February 27, 2002, Wednesday

Senate Democrats yesterday broadened their criticisms of President Bush's judicial nominees to another circuit court candidate, in what Republicans said was a growing pattern of delay and character assassination.

District Judge D. Brooks Smith, chief judge of the Western District of Pennsylvania, faced tough questioning from Judiciary Committee Democrats, as a vote on another embattled nominee was delayed.

"It is absolutely a pattern," said Sen. Jeff Sessions, Alabama Republican and Judiciary Committee member.

"They are taking a series of insignificant and isolated events in a person's life and creating a caricature of that person. Then they ask the Senate to vote down the caricature, not the person," Mr. Sessions said. Led by People for the American Way, liberal groups oppose Judge Smith's views on states' rights, civil rights, the environment and consumer protection. The groups and Democrats also question the conservative nominee's judicial ethics and recusal from a fraud case.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. said he would maintain an open mind with regard to Judge Smith's nomination, but in the same breath threatened to defeat the nominee if he were not completely forthcoming to all questions from Democrats.

"I will do everything in my power to defeat you, including moving to the Senate floor to take action I've never taken in my life as a United States senator, a filibuster," Mr. Biden said.

In a 1993 speech to the Pittsburgh Federalist Society, Judge Smith criticized the Delaware Democrat and his efforts to pass the Violence Against Women Act, some portions of which were overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Judge Smith maintains that states, not the federal government, have power over domestic-violence laws.

Mr. Biden recognized that Judge Smith's foresight was correct but said he was more interested in the nominee's future behavior.

"I care about your judicial philosophy. I don't care where you went; I care about where you are going," Mr. Biden said.

Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, agrees that a pattern is emerging with regard to circuit judge nominations that are delayed or not even considered by Democrats who control the Senate.

The Senate has approved 33 district judges and seven circuit judges, including two confirmed yesterday by a 98-0 vote: Robert Blackburn to the U.S. District of Colorado and Cindy K. Jorgenson to the U.S. District of Arizona. Still pending in committee are 22 circuit judges and 28 district judges.

"I'm not satisfied with the way the president's nominees for the federal judiciary are being treated," Mr. Lott said.

Mr. Lott requested that a committee vote tomorrow on District Judge Charles W. Pickering to a circuit post be postponed one week to allow him more time to answer additional written questions from Democratic senators.

"I do think that Judge Pickering has been treated very poorly," Mr. Lott said. Judge Pickering is one of five nominees who have had hearings but no committee votes.

In addition to two hearings and an intense examination of hundreds of Judge Pickering's written opinions, Mr. Lott said, one Democrat has submitted a list of 78 questions the Mississippi jurist is still answering.

"I think that at least Judge Pickering should have the opportunity to respond to the questions," Mr. Lott said.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and Judiciary Committee chairman, said the process would move more quickly if the White House would work with home-state senators "to identify fair-minded, non-ideological, consensus nominees to fill these court vacancies."

"As we move forward, I have urged the White House to show greater inclusiveness and flexibility and to help make this a truly bipartisan enterprise," Mr. Leahy said.

Democrats peppered Judge Smith with numerous questions about the number of judicial seminars he had attended, a case in which he recused himself and the Federalist Society speech. A committee vote on the Smith nomination has not been scheduled.

"Anyone who has been reading the newspapers in the past few weeks knows that it would be impossible to comment on Judge Smith's credentials without mentioning the attack he has come under from the usual liberal lobbyist interest groups in Washington," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch of Utah, the Judiciary Committee's ranking Republican.

"As President Reagan would say, 'There they go again,'" Mr. Hatch said.

Judge Smith took an untold number of trips to seminars totaling $30,000. Such trips are opposed by Sen. Russell D. Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat and a sponsor of legislation to ban such trips. Judge Smith told the committee he would not take any trips as a circuit court judge if they appeared improper or created a conflict of interest.

Judge Smith recused himself during a 1997 fraud case involving Mid-State Bank, where his wife, Karen, was vice president of lending. The Smiths also held $100,000 to $250,000 of Mid-State Bank stock and a 401(k) fund with the bank in the same amount.

The fraud charge was not leveled at the bank, but a client was accused of defrauding dozens of Pennsylvania school districts.

"At no time did I have an actual conflict of interest that required my automatic disqualification," Judge Smith said.

To avoid an appearance of a conflict of interest, Judge Smith said, he recused himself in the middle of the case, but the rulings he already had made were "neither illegal nor unethical."

"None of the parties, lawyers or judges nor the trustee has questioned my conduct," Judge Smith said.

Sen. John Edwards, North Carolina Democrat, asked numerous questions of state versus congressional authority, including whether Congress had the right to pass legislation making terrorist hoaxes illegal and to criminalize drug use.

"Absolutely," Judge Smith answered each time.

Mr. Sessions cited the American Bar Association's unanimous rating of Judge Smith as "well qualified" as a reason to support the judge.

"He will follow the law, even if he does not agree with it," Mr. Sessions said.

By opposing Pickering, Democrats deal blow to Lott

Gannett News Service

February 26, 2002, Tuesday

WASHINGTON -- Democrats may bury Judge Charles Pickering's nomination to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals this week, dealing a blow to the White House and to the judge's chief champion on Capitol Hill -- Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss.,

Lott, a 30-year friend and political ally of the Hattiesburg-based federal judge, promoted Pickering's candidacy at the White House and pressured the Democratic-controlled Senate to move on the nomination.

But Lott angered Senate Democrats -- especially Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., head of the Senate Judiciary Committee -- by accusing them of dragging their feet on consideration of nearly 100 other Bush judicial nominees. Lott also threatened to block legislation if Leahy's committee failed to schedule hearings on Bush nominees.

Democrats say they're processing Bush's candidates more quickly than Republicans handled President Clinton's judicial nominees when the GOP controlled the chamber. The fight over judicial nominations has left both sides bitter and may have strengthened Democratic resolve to oppose Pickering's candidacy. "In politics the cliché 'what goes around comes around' is truer than in any other field," said Martin Wiseman, head of the Stennis Institute at Mississippi State University.

The Senate Judiciary Committee -- composed 10 Democrats and nine Republicans -- may vote Thursday on Pickering's nomination. Only two committee members say they'll vote "no" on the nomination -- Sens. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., and Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif.

But Feinstein said "there is virtually unanimous opinion on the Democratic side" of the panel that Pickering will not be confirmed.

"I think that people on our side believe that it would be a tremendous mistake to put someone as polarizing in this position now," Feinstein said during a Sunday "Meet the Press" interview.

Democrats on the Judiciary Committee -- some of the most liberal members of their party -- and dozens of special interest groups ranging from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to the American Association of University Women, are concerned Pickering would increase the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeal's conservative tilt. Those opposed to his nomination hope it is buried by an unfavorable vote in the Judiciary Committee and the full Senate never has a chance to consider his candidacy.

But the fight over Pickering has other implications for the White House and for Lott, whose job as Senate minority leader is to promote Bush's judicial nominations.

Pickering's defeat would pave the way for the derailment of other controversial judicial candidates, including D. Brooks Smith, nominated for a seat on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals; Miguel Estrada, a nominee for the District of Columbia Circuit of the U.S. Court of Appeals; and Jeffrey Sutton, a nominee for the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Wiseman said Pickering would not have had a problem if the Senate had not changed hands in the summer when Sen. Jim Jeffords, I-Vt., bolted from the GOP, throwing the majority to the Democrats. If the GOP had retained control of the Judiciary Committee, it's likely it would have swiftly approved the 64-year-old federal judge whom detractors have dubbed "Lott's judge."

There's some indication Lott thinks the partisan fight over the judgeship has a personal angle. He has accused Pickering's opponents of taking a "snooker shot" at him.

Lott spokesman Lee Youngblood hinted at retribution.

"I'm sure that if they don't confirm Pickering ... that Senator Lott will be fairly angry and will consider appropriate action," Youngblood said.

Wiseman said opposition to Pickering was an unusually tough challenge for Lott, who personally lobbied many Senate Judiciary Committee Democrats -- as well as the sole Republican on the panel who appears to have reservations about Pickering, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

"As good as he is at behind the scene deal making, he's had problems with this one," Wiseman said. "And (Lott's) not been asleep at the wheel."

Meanwhile Democratic resolve to block Pickering seems to be hardening. The judge has received dozens of written questions from panel Democrats -- most about the same issues raised during a grueling Feb. 7 Judiciary Committee hearing on the confirmation. Pickering's written responses will not be released until later this week.

In addition, Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., has circulated a letter from Stephen Gillers, a vice dean at New York University's School of Law, that said it was improper for Pickering to solicit letters in support of his nomination from lawyers who regularly appear before him.

"Judge Pickering's conduct creates the appearance of impropriety, in part, because of the power federal judges, and particularly federal trial judges, have over matters that come before them," Gillers wrote.

Senate Confirms Robert E. Blackburn For Federal Bench in Denver

States News Service

February 26, 2002, Tuesday

The Senate officially confirmed State District Judge Robert E. Blackburn of Las Animas for a seat on the federal bench in Denver with a 98-0 vote on Tuesday morning.

Blackburn, 51, currently holds court in Crowley, Otero and Bent Counties. President Bush first nominated Blackburn for the position on Sept. 10 of this year.

The onetime Black Angus cattle rancher has practiced law as a private lawyer, a deputy district attorney, and state judge. Colorado Gov. Roy Romer, a Democrat, first named Blackburn to the state bench in 1988.

Blackburn is expected to be sworn in sometime this spring and for a spot with the U.S. District Court of Colorado in Denver that has been vacant since 1998.

Colorado's two Republican senators, Ben Nighthorse Campbell and Wayne Allard, first suggested Blackburn to the White House as a possible nominee to the federal bench following a recommendation from an independent judicial review committee formed by the two lawmakers.

Both Colorado Senators praised Blackburn following the final Senate confirmation vote.

"Tough, fair, and engaged in his work, Judge Blackburn is an asset to the judicial system," said Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell, R-Colo. "These professional qualities are important characteristics that have served him well and will continue to do so in his new endeavors."

Noting that the federal bench in Denver has been in need of new judges, Allard enthusiastically welcomed Blackburn's final confirmation.

"For too long the people of Colorado have gone without their full compliment of judges," Allard said. "Today's Senate confirmation of Judge Blackburn, along with it's earlier confirmation of U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Marcia Krieger, will help greatly in addressing the delays citizens have been experiencing due to those unfilled vacancies on Colorado's District Court."

Two Republican judges looking to step up to the Court of Appeals level will have to wait at least until next week before finding out whether the Democrat-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee will send their nominations to the full Senate.

U.S. District Judge D. Brooks Smith faced grilling from Judiciary Democrats on Tuesday at his nomination hearing. They questioned his failure to step down immediately when a fraud case involving a bank where his wife worked came before his court. Smith, whom President Bush has nominated for the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia, said he disqualified himself after a month because of the appearance of conflict of interest, although he wasn't required to.

"I wish I had recused myself earlier," Smith said.

Under committee rules, senators now must wait at least a week before they can even bring up Smith's nomination for a vote.

The committee also put off a vote scheduled Thursday on U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering, whose conservative record as a state lawmaker and a federal judge has been questioned by Democrats.

It will be next week at the earliest before the panel considers Pickering's nomination by Bush to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans.

Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., asked the committee to give Pickering extra time to answer a "long list" of written questions submitted by senators after his second confirmation hearing.

February 28, 2002, Thursday

WASHINGTON _ At the request of Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., the Senate Judiciary Committee has postponed a vote on the nomination of Judge Charles W. Pickering Sr. to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

The vote, originally scheduled for Thursday, will take place "sometime next week," said Mimi Devlin, a spokesman for the committee's Democratic majority. Lott said he asked for the postponement to give Pickering more time to respond to written questions submitted to the judge by committee members three weeks ago. He said one senator, whom he did not identify, gave Pickering 78 questions. "I think that Judge Pickering has been treated very poorly," Lott said.

Meanwhile, four Pickering opponents from Mississippi took their case to Lott and Sen. Thad Cochran, R-Miss., in private meetings Tuesday. One of the judge's foes, Kathy Eglund of Gulfport, Miss., said his confirmation would mean "retrogression" on civil rights issues.

Eglund said the news media has distorted the level of support among Mississippi blacks for the judge, who has been endorsed by blacks in his hometown of Laurel and by Charles Evers, brother of slain civil rights leader Medgar Evers. But Pickering's home-state black proponents are more loud than numerous, said Eglund, a veteran of the NAACP who is serving her second term on the organization's national board of directors.

"Charles Pickering would open a gateway of horror in our own back yards," she said, citing decisions Pickering issued against plaintiffs in employment discrimination cases. "I can't speak for anybody else, what's on their hearts." Pickering's nomination has been criticized by Democratic senators and interest groups that have called his legal record "insensitive and sometimes even hostile" to civil rights. They have also questioned whether he violated judicial ethics by intervening on behalf of a cross-burning suspect in 1995. Eglund and the rest of the four-person delegation from Mississippi assailed the judge for calling the cross burning, which took place in Walthall County in 1993, a "drunken prank."

Pickering asked federal prosecutors to reduce the charges against one of the three suspects, whom he deemed less responsible for the crime than the others.

"That (Pickering) would call burning a cross 'a drunken prank,' I can't tell you how offensive that is to me," said Richard Glisson, president of Students Envisioning Equality through Diversity at the University of Mississippi. "In fact, I'll go far enough to say that Sen. Lott is racially insensitive for nominating him."

Glisson and Eglund were joined by Jolivet Anderson and Betty Thompson, both of Jackson, for the meetings with Lott and Cochran, who both said they still support Pickering.

But staffers for the Democratic senators on the Senate Judiciary Committee predicted the vote would go against the judge and said the delay would make no difference in the vote.

"We're pretty unified on this side," one said, echoing comments made Sunday by Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., a committee member.

Judicial gridlock in Senate: same story, different setting

The Hill

February 27, 2002 Wednesday

Despite Republican accusations that Senate Democrats are moving too slowly on President Bush's judicial nominees, legal experts say the nominations are proceeding at a pace roughly on a par with previous congresses.

However, the same experts argue that the confirmation process still needs reforming, citing the fact that 95 of the 844 federal circuit and district court judgeships, or about 11 percent of the total, remain vacant.

For more than a decade, each party has blamed the other for holding up nominees on ideological grounds, a debate currently focused on Bush's controversial nomination of District Judge Charles Pickering of Mississippi to the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, and likely to grow louder if Bush has the opportunity to fill any vacancies on the U.S. Supreme Court.

The GOP complaints echo those made by Democrats in the 1990s, when many of President Clinton's nominees were held up for months or even years or never given a hearing by a Republican Senate.

But legal experts say this is a case of the pot calling the kettle black, with both sides treating nominees roughly the same when in control of the Senate. Sarah Binder, a fellow at the Brookings Institution and political science professor at George Washington University, said that much like previous years, the Senate is confirming district court nominees while nominees to higher-profile appellate courts get bogged down.

But Binder asserted that the parties do not hold up nominees solely for revenge. "My sense is that the Democrats aren't playing tit for tat. Both sides did it because they care deeply about the ideological makeup of the courts."

Michael Gerhardt, law professor at the College of William and Mary and author of The Federal Appointments Process, noted that the Senate Judiciary Committee faced an unprecedented situation in the past year. Democrats suddenly took control of the Senate in June and Vermont's Patrick Leahy (D) replaced Utah's Orrin Hatch (R) as chairman, and the panel had to expedite antiterrorism legislation after Sept. 11.

Democrats also insisted on waiting for the American Bar Association (ABA) to provide ratings on nominees before acting on them. Last March, Bush ended the 50-year practice of sending the names of judicial nominees to the ABA before sending them to the Senate.

"I don't think we're off the chart with anything terribly unusual going on [in the Judiciary Committee]," Gerhardt said. "I don't think either side is without some blame. ... The pattern over the last decade has been that judicial selections have been relatively slow and filled with a lot of payback."

As of Monday, there were 50 Bush nominees for circuit and district court slots pending before the Judiciary Committee.

But the average number of days from nomination to confirmation for judicial nominees - a good indication of how quickly the panel is acting - has improved this session.

It took an average of 106 days for the process when Democrats controlled the Senate during President Reagan's last two years in the White House in 1987-88, according to Judiciary Committee statistics.

That number remained fairly steady during the next two Congresses - 106 days and 114 days - when Democrats still controlled the Senate and acted on the first President Bush's nominees.

The average dropped to 80 days during President Clinton's first two years in office but rose again after Republicans took back the Senate in 1994, peaking at 225 during 1997-98.

Since Democrats took control of the Senate last June, that number has again fallen, according to Sheldon Goldman, professor of political science at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst and author of Picking Federal Judges: Lower Court Selection from Roosevelt through Reagan.

"The average number of days for those confirmed in 2001 is some 25 or 30 days less than what it took the Republicans during the previous Congress," he said.

Goldman stressed that, although Leahy and his staff are moving quickly on the noncontroversial nominees, the system needs an overhaul.

"That is so badly needed, because we've come to a crisis point where there is obstruction and delay instead of advise and consent on the part of a number of senators," he said. "It's not Senator Leahy who is obstructing and delaying, just as it was not Senator Hatch who was. But they cannot unilaterally change the rules."

With rising concern over the vacancy rate, both Leahy and Hatch, now the ranking member, cite different statistics to bolster their argument that they treated judicial nominees fairly.

Leahy points out that from the day Democrats took control of the Senate through the end of 2001, the chamber had confirmed 28 of Bush's nominees. That increased to 37 by the start of the President's Day recess.

By contrast, the Senate confirmed 27 of President Clinton's nominees his first year in office, and 15 of former President Bush's nominees in his first year, 1989.

"In the six years that a Republican majority was considering President Clinton's judicial nominations, more than 50 nominees never received a hearing and a committee vote," Leahy told the Senate last month. "During those years, the Republican majority in the Senate went entire sessions without confirming a single judge for the Courts of Appeals."

But Republicans point to nominees who have not yet been given hearings and to the 50 Bush circuit and district court nominees pending before the Judiciary Committee.

Charles Fried, solicitor general under the first President Bush, said that Leahy's refusal to schedule hearings on George W. Bush's judicial nominees is "disgraceful and unjustified."

He added, "Which isn't to say that the Republicans didn't do the same thing, but I don't think they did it as much."

Hatch defends his record vigorously. Soon after Democrats took control of the Senate in June, he told the Judiciary Committee, "I would like to address some recent attempts to reinvent history by repeating the convenient myth that I, as chairman, blocked President Clinton's judicial nominees on the basis of political ideology."

Hatch cited the overall rate of confirmations under his watch. During Clinton's two administrations, the Senate confirmed 377 judicial nominees, only five short of the all-time record of 382 confirmed under President Reagan.

Goldman urged the Democratic and Republican leadership to change the ground rules for nominations, guaranteeing every nominee a hearing and vote no matter who controls the Senate and White House.

But he predicted the process will only be changed if both sides accept fault for the current situation.

"Everyone plays the blame game," he said. "You can trace it back to the 1980s. But there's no question that in the 1990s the Republicans ratcheted up the stakes here. ... The Democrats very understandably don't want to do this unilaterally because that's not going to solve the problem."

The situation has reached a crisis point, according to Dick Carelli, spokesman for the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts.

"Vacancies now are at a level that is problematic for the federal courts," he said. "So is the lack of new judgeships. The Congress and the executive have not provided for a new judgeship bill since 1990. The caseload of the federal judiciary has mushroomed since 1990."

In the end, the controversy over the judicial nomination process comes down to specific seats that are left open for long periods of time because of controversial nominees.

"It's gotten to the point where we're jeopardized the ability of the judicial branch of government to do its job," Goldman said. "The process of obstruction and delay should end."

Mixed Signals in Senate Battle Over Appeals Court Nominee

Neil A. Lewis
The New York Times
February 28, 2002, Thursday

For a time, it appeared today that Senator Trent Lott, the Republican leader, was sending a classic Washington public hint to a friend.

Mr. Lott told reporters that Judge Charles W. Pickering Sr. would have to decide on his own whether to continue his efforts to be confirmed to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, based in New Orleans. "I'm not advocating this, but he's got to decide whether he wants to go forward with a vote if the votes aren't there, whether he wants to terminate the process," said Mr. Lott, a Mississippi Republican.

The Senate Judiciary Committee postponed a vote scheduled for Thursday on the Pickering nomination at Mr. Lott's request as it appeared increasingly likely that the committee's Democrats, who hold a 10-to-9 majority, would band together and reject the nomination.

But this evening, Judge Pickering's son, Representative Charles W. Pickering Jr., said Senator Lott had assured him that he did not intend to nudge his father to withdraw. Aides to Mr. Lott said the same thing.

"My father has no intent of withdrawing," said Representative Pickering, Republican of Mississippi, "and we believe it's still a winnable fight and the right fight to have."

The Pickering nomination has turned into the Bush administration's first major judicial confirmation battle. Liberal groups have portrayed Judge Pickering, who has been a federal trial judge in Mississippi for 11 years, as hostile to civil rights plaintiffs. His supporters say that this is unfair and that Judge Pickering is a leading figure in racial reconciliation efforts.

Judge Pickering's son signaled a possible strategy for getting his father confirmed when he said his father deserved a vote on the full Senate floor. That means that even if the Judiciary Committee votes against the nomination, Judge Pickering's supporters would seek to have the nomination reported to the full Senate. The Democrats hold a one-vote majority there, but the Pickering forces would try to win one or more Democrats to their cause.

Bush Makes Plea for Pickering Vote

Mark Preston
Roll Call
February 28, 2002

With tempers flaring in the Senate over the controversial circuit court nomination of U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering, President Bush made a personal plea yesterday to Majority Leader Thomas Daschle (D-S.D.) to confirm the Mississippian.

The President's request for Pickering's quick confirmation came in the context of a larger conversation on the pace of judicial nominations in the Senate during a semiregular breakfast meeting with Congressional leaders at the White House.

"The President raised the subject and I expressed my concerns to Daschle, and the President joined in," said Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.), who noted this is the first time Bush has weighed in on the Pickering nomination "on a personal basis."

"In the case of Charles Pickering, I expressed my disappointment and my hurt," Lott said of remarks he made to Daschle during the meeting. "This really has become an attack on my state, and it is a very unfair characterization of the judge."

But Daschle disputed Lott's claim that the President made a personal plea to confirm Pickering, who has been a lightning rod for controversy since he was nominated for the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in September 2001.

"Senator Lott's and my recollection of the conversation is different," Daschle said. "The President didn't ask for a floor vote, he asked what the prospects were, and I said I didn't know."

"There wasn't any request of me to take it to the floor. He made his general views known about the need to move ahead on judges, and expressed the hope that we could confirm as many as possible."

A White House source supported Lott's account of what was discussed in the meeting.

"The President is very concerned about the way Charles Pickering is being treated," the source said. "He is a good man. He is worthy of confirmation and the President believes he should be confirmed."

For now, Pickering's confirmation hearings have been put on hold at Lott's request, providing the Minority Leader with at least one more week to devise a strategy to move his friend's nomination to the floor. But Lott acknowledged that Pickering and Bush must mull their options, including the possibility of having the Mississippian voluntarily step aside to avoid defeat.

"I am not advocating this, but he has got to decide whether he wants to go forward with a vote if the votes aren't there," said Lott, who added that Bush must also assess "whether he wants to terminate the process or go to other people.

"You deal with the issues as they come to a head. Right now we are still hoping for and expecting a vote to report him out."

Even though the Senate confirmed two judges Tuesday, the Pickering battle has highlighted the deep ideological divide between Republicans and Democrats over judicial nominees. But a resolution on the Pickering nomination is unlikely to cool tempers in the chamber. In fact, earlier this week, Democrats and Republicans locked horns over another nomination, that of U.S. District Court Judge D. Brooks Smith to the 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals.

While Lott said there is some progress being made on district court judges, he charged that the Democrat-controlled Judiciary Committee is purposely dragging its feet on circuit court nominees.

"They are trying their best to delay and not act on those circuit judges," Lott said. "In fact, a lot of those circuit judges were nominated last May and they have not even had a hearing."

A spokesman for Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) defended the pace, suggesting it had been going much quicker since a Democrat assumed the gavel last summer.

"Under Democratic leadership ... the Judiciary Committee has returned to regular hearings and has a solid record of bringing nominations to the Senate for confirmation," said David Carle, Leahy's spokesman.

So far the Senate has approved seven circuit court and 32 district court judges. There are currently 22 circuit court and 28 district court nominations pending in the Judiciary Committee.

As for his conversation with Bush about Pickering, Daschle said that they discussed the "history of the debate on judges over the years.

"But what I said was that that's a matter for the Judiciary Committee. If the Judiciary Committee doesn't vote the nomination, with or without recommendation, to the floor, then I would be hard-pressed to do anything on the floor. I respect the Judiciary Committee's decisions, and we have to accept those."

While Daschle said he would not push for Pickering to get a hearing if the nominee is voted down in committee, the Majority Leader did reiterate his pledge to allow a vote by the full Senate on any Supreme Court nominee regardless of the Judiciary panel's recommendation.

"I'm reluctant to do that, but I think that matters of that [importance] oftentimes require that the full Senate have an opportunity to be heard," Daschle said. "But I can't extend that to all the nominees from the Judiciary Committee or you wouldn't have to have a Judiciary Committee; you'd just come to the floor with everything.

"And, of course, that's not a luxury that the Republicans afforded us when they were in the majority. But that's not the reason. The reason is it's just important for us to respect the jurisdiction and the responsibilities of the Judiciary Committee."

Judge Pickering's Record on the Right to Choose

February 26, 2002, Tuesday

Opposition to the nomination of Charles Pickering for the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals stems from his hostility to a woman's right to choose, a record he has never repudiated. Mr. Pickering helped lead the Republican Party to its antiabortion stance at the 1976 convention and has twice sought constitutional amendments to ban abortion.

The states of the 5th Circuit -- Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas -- are among the most active in restricting a woman's right to choose; indeed, Louisiana sought in 1991 to reenact a criminal ban on abortion. Today, these states are enacting laws that attempt to regulate clinics out of existence and encourage ruinous lawsuits against them. Mr. Pickering says he is bound to follow precedent, but nothing in his record or his judicial philosophy suggests that he would see these infringements as unconstitutional. Judges who hold Mr. Pickering's views pose a double threat to equality, for the laws being enacted in the 5th Circuit fall particularly heavily on poor women and women of color. The Senate Judiciary Committee should not countenance such views by confirming Charles Pickering.

His Words Convict Him

Los Angeles Times

February 27, 2002 Wednesday

In two days of testimony earlier this month, Judge Charles Pickering made clearer than ever why the Senate Judiciary Committee should block his elevation to the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals. One question remains. After poring over Pickering's record and grilling him during the hearing, will the senators who pronounced themselves "troubled" match their rhetoric with the "no" votes this nomination deserves? Responding to sometimes testy questions from committee members, Pickering tried but failed to justify two glaring ethical lapses: Why, as a judge, did he have a forbidden conversation with prosecutors in 1994 to get a reduced sentence for a convicted cross burner, and why, in recent months, did he lean on lawyers who have appeared before him to write letters supporting his nomination?

Senators also took Pickering back over now-familiar ground: his court decisions that reveal his predisposition to disbelieve claims of racial discrimination, sexual harassment and voting rights violations, and his outspoken and unrelenting opposition as a Mississippi state senator to abortion, except to save the pregnant woman's life.

Pickering's answers didn't help his case, and since the hearing some Democratic committee members have announced their intention to vote against his nomination, probably next month. Democrats hold a 10-9 majority on the committee. But as opposition to Pickering mounts, so does the ire of Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, who has vowed that his friend and fellow Mississippian will be confirmed "or else."

Lott insists that this confirmation fight is about churlish Democrats who, by imposing litmus tests on judicial nominees, seek to deny a Republican president his prerogative to make appointments. It's not. It's about a nominee whose past actions and judicial record amply show him to be at odds with the principles of fairness, independence and equal opportunity that guide our courts and our nation.

If Democrats sink Pickering's nomination in committee, Lott is reportedly considering asking the full Senate for a "motion to discharge" the nomination from the Judiciary Committee, clearing the way for a vote on the floor that he is likely to win. The use of such a motion would be unprecedented in a judicial nomination fight, not to mention a baldfaced affront to the integrity of the Senate's committee structure.

If Republicans mean what they say about wanting to avoid a polarizing contest, President Bush should withdraw Pickering's nomination. If Lott's pigheadedness pushes the matter to a final battle on the floor, responsible senators must vote no.

It shouldn't come to that. The Constitution's drafters meant the Senate to be a check on the president, and the confirmation process a way to ensure that federal judgeship nominations are more than just payback for political favors. That means when a nominee isn't up to the job--and Pickering isn't--senators on the Judiciary Committee must reject him or her no matter the arm-twisting, no matter the menacing threats of retribution.

Substandard; Pickering's performance on the bench shows why he shouldn't be ratified for federal judge.

Newsday (New York, NY)

February 27, 2002 Wednesday

When Bill Clinton was in the White House, Senate Republicans often let his judicial nominations die without so much as a hearing. Yet lately, Republicans have had the gall to complain about the Senate's allegedly slow pace in dealing with President George W. Bush's choices for federal judgeships.

Not yesterday, though. Yesterday, Republican Minority Leader Trent Lott actually asked the Senate to postpone a decision on promoting a fellow Mississippian from a trial court to the appellate level, to give the nominee more time to answer a long list of questions. And no wonder. The nomination of U.S. District Court Judge Charles Pickering Sr. to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals is in serious trouble, as it deserves to be. His record on the bench has been undistinguished at best. In one cross-burning case involving guilty pleas by two out of three defendants, he lobbied the Justice Department vigorously to reduce the mandatory sentence of the third, who had been convicted on three charges. As a state legislator, he was more supportive of civil rights than many, but even there the evaluations are mixed; while many hometown blacks approve of his nomination, the state NAACP does not. To call his record "exemplary," as a Lott spokesman did yesterday, is to ignore too many inconvenient facts.

The Senate Judiciary Committee's obligation is to give Bush's judicial nominees due consideration and come to a decision on each. It is not to rubber-stamp them. A cabinet or White House appointee departs with the president, but a federal judge, once appointed, serves at his own pleasure or his maker's.

That said, a committee with a fragile 10-9 Democratic majority shouldn't try to block every judge nominated by a Republican president. It should embrace nominees who are clearly in the wide mainstream of American jurisprudence and have demonstrated the skills and temperament

"Judge Pickering should have the opportunity to respond to the questions," Lott said.

At least two Democrats aren't waiting on Pickering's answers. Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina joined California Sen. Dianne Feinstein in going public with his intention to vote against Pickering.

His "record as a judge clearly demonstrates that he is willing to put his own views above the law," Edwards said.

The Senate confirmed without dissent two new district judges on Tuesday: Cindy Jorgenson of Arizona and Robert Blackburn of Colorado. They were confirmed by 98-0 votes.

Like Pickering, Smith's supporters said the judge's record is being distorted, and he deserves to be on the higher court. "There is a lot of misinformation about him out there," Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., told the committee.

Democrats questioned Smith, 50, for overseeing for a month in 1997 a fraud trial involving Mid-State Bank.

Smith's wife, Karen Smith, was vice president of the lending department at Mid-State Bank at the time. The Smiths also held Mid-State stock.

Smith said Tuesday he didn't know Mid-State Bank would be involved, and there wasn't enough of a conflict later on to trigger an automatic disqualification.

"I was still satisfied ... there was no specific information that had been presented to me that was sufficient to suggest a basis for recusal," Smith said.

Smith issued several rulings before taking himself out of the trial, but the Justice Department cleared him of any wrongdoing.

Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., questioned Smith's frequency of taking paid educational trips. He said Smith has taken more such trips than all but four judges in the nation. Feingold said the trips' total value was about $30,000, and some were to resort locations like Hilton Head Island, S.C.

Smith said the trips were purely for educational purposes, but he would not attend similar seminars if elevated to the appeals court unless he was sure it would not cause an appearance of conflict of interest.

Dems Lose in Redistricting Fight appropriate to the job. Judge Pickering's substandard performance on the bench offers scant cause for promotion.

Yet a White House spokesman said yesterday that Bush "believes in Judge Pickering and will fight for Judge Pickering." If so, it's a fight the president deserves to lose.

Who Is Charles Pickering?

Monday, February 25, 2002

Stacey Barney

This week the nomination of U.S. District Court Judge Charles Pickering, Sr. to the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals will be brought before the Senate Judiciary Committee for a deciding vote, and it is unlikely that the Pickering nomination will be confirmed. But the question as to why Pickering would not be the correct fit for the 5th circuit has become something of a media - flamed political spectacle, which should give any observer pause to wonder what is this really all about?

The NAACP would have us believe the blocking of the Pickering nomination is an honorable effort to maintain the integrity of civil rights legislation, while other groups such as the Alliance for Justice, People for the American Way, and the National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League (NARAL) point with worry lines etched across their brows to Pickering's "consistently conservative record on employment, discrimination, voting rights, abortion, and criminal law (Jonathan Groner of Legal Times, 2002)."

However, Republicans who support Pickering tell a different story. Plainly they call the scrutiny of Charles Pickering and his judicial record character assassination. In fact, Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Kent) says this about the judge: "The record of Charles Pickering can be expressed in two words: moral courage. When victims of racial injustice looked for justice, they found it in one man, Jones County Attorney Charles Pickering." Yet, still others daresay the grumblings blocking Pickering's judicial promotion is nothing more than a round of political payback for democrats who remember "three Clinton appointees who were denied [even] the courtesy of a hearing, much less a vote, when Republicans controlled the Senate (Philip Terzian of Pittsburgh Post Gazette, 2002)."

So who is to be believed? Is the Pickering nomination in fact the good fight to be fought and won in the name of civil rights or is it simply new political battleground ripe for partisan posturing? Well, the first question to ask really is who is Charles Pickering, anyway? Is he the champion of minority civil rights who braved the danger of testifying against Ku Klux Klan members during the height of racially motivated slayings or is he the segregationist throwback, a bigot who has written in support of criminalizing interracial marriages? It's really hard to say, since his record tells us that Pickering is both these men.

To my mind this fact in and of itself necessitates if not demands the careful character scrutiny that Judge Pickering has been subjected to since his first Senate hearing on October 18th - the same scrutiny that some on Capitol Hill are calling regrettable character assassination.

In these hearings we have discovered that yes, Pickering has testified against Klan members. And yes, as Johnny Magee, an African American Laurel business man and member of city council defends, Pickering has even helped Laurel, Mississippi "civic leaders...develop after-school programs to keep Black males from coming into his court on criminal charges." But as Eugene Bryant, President of the NAACP Mississippi State Conference points out, Pickering (when a senator) has "also voted to support the Sovereignty Commission, a state - funded agency established to thwart desegregation efforts resulting from the landmark Brown v. Board of Education." Additionally, Pickering, according to Bryant, has also blocked "the implementation of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, keeping the Mississippi Legislative all white until" 1980. Furthermore, Bryant censures Pickering for referring to "the fundamental 'one-person, one-vote' principle as obtrusive" and "[criticizing] the creation of majority-black districts as 'affirmative segregation.'" While all this and more seems to be true of Charles Pickering, the final nail in his coffin was, ironically, a burning cross.

In 1994 Mickey Herbert Thomas (25), Daniel Swan (20), and a 17-year-old who was charged as a juvenile were suspected of burning a cross on the lawn of a Black homeowner in Pickering's jurisdiction. Thomas and the juvenile offender both reached plea agreements with sentences of supervised release without prison time. Swan, however, went to trial and was convicted. He faced 7 ½ years before Judge Pickering complained to the Department of Justice. Although, the Department of Justice declined to assist Pickering, prosecutors in the case did end up dropping one charge against Swan, and Pickering subsequently sentenced the young man to 27 months instead of the 7 and a half years initially sought by state prosecutors. Pickering defends his actions by pointing out what he believes was a disparity in sentencing among the three assailants. It was the juvenile defendant, Pickering claims, who was in fact the ringleader, and it disturbed Pickering that this defendant did not receive one day in jail. While I agree that the point regarding sentencing disparity is a good one - all should have received prison sentences, I am less sure that this disparity justifies Pickering granting a more lenient punishment to Daniel Swan, a not only culpable defendant (though perhaps arguable in degree), but a convicted defendant. The criminal system rarely treats African American youth with the same consideration.

But perhaps most troubling in regards to Pickering's court decisions in discrimination and civil rights cases aside from the fact that "[Pickering] has often ruled against civil rights claims (Jonathan Groner of Legal Times, 2002)," are the opinions rendered in these cases. Pickering's opponents suggest that often these opinions reflect the judge's personal biases and characterize the language Pickering chooses as harsh and insensitive to plaintiffs.

In Foxworth, et al. v. Merchants Co., a case involving two Blacks who jointly owned a grocery store, and sought damages under the civil rights laws against a supplier who stopped extending credit, Pickering wrote: "When an adverse action is taken affecting one covered by [civil rights] laws, there is a tendency on the part of the person affected to spontaneously react that discrimination caused the action. All of us have difficulty accepting the fact that we sometimes create our own problems."

In Seeley v. City of Hattiesburg, a case involving a Black firefighter who was terminated, and also sought damages under the protection of civil rights laws, Pickering wrote: "The fact that a Black employee is terminated does not automatically indicate discrimination...This case has all the hallmarks of a case that is filed simply because an adverse employment decision was made in regard to a protected minority."

Elliot Minberg, legal director of People for the American Way raises an eyebrow at such statements, and their presence in court opinions saying, "When [Pickering] writes that this case is an unwanted effect of the anti-discrimination laws, this reflects a hostile attitude and sends a message to future plaintiffs. That's very troubling to us."

With all this before us, it makes sense then that the NAACP, along with the Magnolia Bar Association (a predominately Black Mississippi bar group), and a host of other groups looking to protect the rights guaranteed by the constitution, would dare to question and block the nomination of this man, Charles Pickering. His record is one that tells two tales, and while the nuggets regarding Ku Klux Klan testimony and an after-school program for African American youth sound nice, there are too many other aspects of his record that are just plain doubtful and troubling. In looking at Pickering's record it is all the more important to remember that racism did not die with Malcolm X or Martin Luther King Jr. In fact, racism is far more potent as it has become almost a seamless part of American society, especially within the context of our nation's governing bodies.

No, racism did not die. It simply became institutionalized. And it is this institutional racism that keeps Black youth in the penal system without rehabilitation efforts that address the phenomena of miseducation and poverty, which first put our youth in jails and on death row. If confirmed would Charles Pickering be an agent to combat this reality of institutional racism or would he enable it? I'm not so sure. His record doesn't tell me he would be a combatant against racism. His record just makes me nervous.

The second significant question to be asked concerning the Pickering nomination is in regards to the real importance of the 5th Circuit seat, a seat with authority in Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas - densely populated Black territory. If Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif) is to be believed, "...this 5th Circuit seat is as important as a Supreme Court seat...The 5th Circuit once served as a trailblazer for the protection of individual rights - voting rights, employment discrimination. So this becomes a pivotal position for people who have fought for these rights for decades." Pickering's record certainly does not strike me as that of a civil rights trailblazer. At best, perhaps he is a racial progressive, but yet not a fit for this "pivotal" 5th Circuit seat.

So, in the end, who is Charles Pickering? A segregationist racist or a man of moral courage who is an unfortunate political scapegoat? If these fundamental questions can't be answered with any sense of surety, then Pickering does not belong on the 5th Circuit bench.

Pickering's Fault is Temperament, Not Race

Thomas Oliphant

The Boston Globe

WASHINGTON - THE FIRST SERIOUS FEDERAL JUDGE FIGHT OF GEORGE W. BUSH'S PRESIDENCY IS TAKING A WELCOME TURN TOWARD THE UNUSUAL.

The nomination of US District Judge Charles Pickering of Mississippi to the US Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in New Orleans (a simple piece of Trent Lott patronage) started out as a typical left-right tussle - a battle over characterization more than character, in this case unfairly involving race.

But as the Pickering nomination moves toward a vote in the Senate Judiciary Committee, it looks as though his fate will be determined by a standard capable of being applied to nominees regardless of ideology - temperament.

The nomination is in serious trouble. But not because Pickering is a conservative political and social issue activist. It's in trouble because a voluminous paper trail shows that Pickering took his political activism into the judiciary in a manner that is incompatible with his current job and dangerous in a potential appellate judge a rung below the Supreme Court. Almost from the moment Senate Republican leader Lott engineered Pickering's nomination, interest groups on the left mobilized against it, focusing initially on race.

It was poorly thought through and unjust in its imputation of racism. Fortunately, an initial portrait of a garden-variety segregationist 40 years ago turned into a more nuanced picture of a man who not only changed but opposed racists and eventually became part of Mississippi's reconciliation process.

The same guy, however, was an early figure in post-segregation conservative activism and has spent the last dozen years on the bench venting at the laws and doctrines he gets paid to apply.

And he would bring not only a well-known opposition to abortion rights but a record of intense activity on behalf of ending those rights. Pickering was a visible figure in Mississippi's pivotal delegation to the 1976 convention that chose Gerald Ford over Ronald Reagan. As a platform subcommittee chairman at Kansas City, then state senator, Pickering was a leader of efforts to overturn Roe v. Wade by constitutional amendment and block support of the Equal Rights Amendment. He also was president of the Mississippi Baptist Convention when it opposed abortion rights even in cases of rape and incest.

Pickering's confirmation hearing pledge to be impartial might have credibility if he didn't violate it continually as a district judge, well known locally for his compulsive commentary on law and precedent outside the boundaries of the cases before him. He's done it on voting rights cases, privacy issues, employment discrimination matters, habeas corpus petitions, and a criminal case involving a cross-burning incident.

In documents made public as Pickering went before the Judiciary Committee a second time this month, it was revealed that he had leaned on both the prosecutors and the Justice Department to seek a lesser sentence for one of three men who burned a cross on the lawn of a mixed-race couple and then fired shots into their home, where a baby was asleep.

Upset at sentencing guidelines calling for seven years in jail, he leaned on the prosecutors in an out-of-court meeting to recommend a shorter sentence, then contacted their superiors. In the end, the offender got 27 months.

Every confirmation hearing has its "moment," and Pickering's came when Democratic Senator John Edwards of North Carolina led him through the command of judicial ethics that contact with one side in a case is a no-no. The judge was visibly stunned, and his claim not to remember threatening to order a new trial has no credibility.

Lott has no cause to bellyache about Pickering's treatment. His two hearings and an imminent vote stand in contrast to the treatment of President Clinton's nominees to the all-white Fifth Circuit (both Hispanics in an area that is almost half poor and nonwhite); each suffered death by delay and GOP inaction.

Nor should cries of victimization from the Republicans or Mississippi partisans be heeded, even on race. It was Pickering, after all, who got caught in a 1978 US Senate primary spreading the slander in the black community that his opponent, Thad Cochran, had been on the racist White Citizens Council. Cochran, Lott's senior colleague and a man of impeccable conservatism as well as integrity, trounced Pickering.

This is simply a bad nomination and will only be supported by moderate Republicans out of enforced loyalty to Lott, not by dedication to high standards for the federal appellate judiciary.

"A fascinating thing has happened on the way to the Senate 'borking' of appellate court nominee Charles Pickering Sr. Taking orders from their interest groups, Beltway Democrats have tried to portray the Mississippian as a modern Lester Maddox. But the African-Americans back in the judge's hometown of Laurel have responded that nothing could be further from the truth. So whom to believe? The people who know Judge Pickering personally and have watched him in court and local politics for years? Or the national liberal lobbies that have a history of turning judicial hearings into political bloodsport?"

Keep Pickering Off Appeals Court

Nora Cusack, Madison
Capital Times (Madison, WI)
February 26, 2002 Tuesday

Dear Editor: The process of confirming President Bush's judicial nominees should not be rushed. Their records need to be carefully examined. Judge Charles Pickering Sr., Bush's nominee to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, has a proven record of opposing civil and reproductive rights. The 5th Circuit is one of the most critical courts in the United States for women's reproductive rights.

As a conservative political activist, Pickering has demonstrated open hostility to a woman's right to choose. Twice he has sought constitutional amendments to ban abortion. This alone should disqualify him from sitting on the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Federal judges serve for life. Both of our senators serve on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which will determine whether Pickering's nomination comes to a vote.

All committee members need to carefully consider Pickering's positions on basic constitutional freedoms, civil rights and reproductive rights.

I ask Sen. Herb Kohl and Sen. Russ Feingold to vote against Pickering's confirmation. All who support reproductive rights need to contact both our senators and urge them to vote against Pickering.

Judge's Views Make Him Unfit

Dear Editor: In the past weeks, we have heard quite a bit about the need to speed the judicial nomination process. Missing from this discussion, however, is the fact that many of the Bush administration's judicial nominees hold radical views not shared by the American public. Judge Charles Pickering, judicial candidate for the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, is just such a nominee. A fervent opponent of a woman's right to choose, he has voted to ban abortion, stop public funding of family planning clinics and against the Equal Rights Amendment. An adversary of civil rights, Pickering has criticized principles protecting civil rights, sought to limit their application and denigrated those who seek to invoke civil rights laws.

Judges with beliefs so out of line with the American public do not belong in a federal appellate court. With both of our senators sitting on the Senate Judiciary Committee, we in Wisconsin are in a unique position to use our voices to keep Pickering off the bench. Please contact Sens. Russ Feingold and Herb Kohl today and ask them to oppose the appointment of Charles Pickering.

Questions for Judge Smith

The Washington Post

February 26, 2002, Tuesday

THE SENATE Judiciary Committee today takes up the nomination of D. Brooks Smith to the 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals. Judge Smith, who currently serves on a federal district court in Pennsylvania, has not sparked the same hot controversy as President Bush's nominee to the 5th Circuit, Charles Pickering. But senators ought not let his nomination slip through without probing carefully certain aspects of Judge Smith's record. They might start with his opinion in United States v. Pennsylvania -- a case in which the federal government sued the state over allegedly substandard conditions in a home for the mentally retarded. Though care was, in Judge Smith's words, "frequently not optimal" -- maggots were found in one resident's ear, ants on others' bodies -- the judge found these to be "isolated incidents" redressed by the facility, and he concluded that there was no constitutional problem. Judge Smith's decisions have often been reversed by the court to which he has been nominated. In one case, for example, the 3rd Circuit wrote that he had "ignored both the letter and spirit of our mandate."

Senators should also ask him about a speech he gave in 1993 on federalism. During the Clinton administration, conservatives blasted appeals court nominee Richard Paez for a speech that, in passing, criticized a nascent ballot initiative in California repealing affirmative action. If intrusion into the political process is the issue, Judge Smith's remarks make those of Judge Paez seem tame. The Smith speech was an argument against the constitutionality of the Violence Against Women Act, then pending in Congress. Portions of that law did have problems and were later struck down by the Supreme Court. But Judge Smith's speech is particularly disturbing for the remarkably constricted vision of federal power that he embraces. The power to regulate commerce -- a pillar of much federal civil rights law -- was intended by the Founders only "to permit the national government to eliminate trade barriers," he said. Judge Smith went on to lay out his own "brief principles for determining the scope of federal jurisdiction. First, ask whether the subject matter at issue is within the power of the national government by express delegation in the text of the Constitution, or impliedly through a historically honest reading of the necessary and proper clause. If not, stop!" Senators should ask him how such an understanding can be squared -- if it can -- with modern civil rights and environmental statutes.

Finally, Judge Smith should be given an opportunity to clear the air about his decision to preside over a case involving a bank at which his wife was an officer and in whose parent company the two owned large amounts of stock. While the bank was not a party to the litigation, its financial interest in the case seems -- at least in retrospect -- obvious. Judge Smith, however, did not initially recuse himself, and some of his rulings before he finally did so seemed to be in the bank's interests.

Judge Smith and Pickering on their work; Choice of president's nominees should not be a political decision

Thomas L. Jipping
The Washington Times
February 26, 2002, Tuesday

A truly rare event occurs today in the U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee - a hearing on one of President Bush's appeals court nominees. Only three of even the first 11 nominees named last May have been so blessed.

On the other hand, a now-familiar pattern of abuse is emerging as the far left tries to smear another honorable man and distinguished nominee. This time it's D. Brooks Smith, chief U.S. district judge for the Western District of Pennsylvania and nominee to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. Judge Smith has experience in private practice, as a prosecutor, an elected state court judge (receiving both Democratic and Republican nominations), and 14 years as a federal judge. He has served on criminal-procedure rules committees for both the state and federal judiciaries and on the board of directors of the Federal Judges Association. He is a former board member of the Salvation Army and the county Legal Services Corp., Domestic Abuse Project and Society for Crippled Children and Adults. The liberal American Bar Association gave him its highest rating for appointment to the appeals court.

All of this, and the fact that the Constitution lets presidents appoint judges, is apparently not enough. The far left believes judges exist to impose a political agenda, to deliver the political goods. In their world, judges base decisions on political interests rather than the law; they are just supposed to rule the right (or, rather, the left) way in the end. That's why a nominee's personal opinions, values, beliefs and ideology are so important and why they believe only liberals are qualified to be federal judges.

Their attacks on Bush nominees aim to keep individuals not liberal enough off the bench today and to dissuade the president from nominating someone not liberal enough to the Supreme Court in the future. The truth alone, however, won't accomplish the goal. Hence the smear.

The liberal Washington Post's Sept. 17 editorial about appeals court nominee Charles Pickering (the Judiciary Committee votes on him Thursday) correctly described the elements of the smear campaign. It's an "ugly affair" in which the nominee's attackers focus "not on his qualifications, temperament, approach to judging or on the quality of his judicial work." Instead, they try to "paint him" a particular way they believe will make ordinary people recoil and senators vote no.

"To do so," The Post said, "they have plucked a number of unconnected incidents from a long career. None of these incidents, when examined closely, amounts to much, but opponents string them together, gloss over their complexities and self-righteously present a caricature of an unworthy candidate." It's actually worse than that. When examined closely, it's obvious the far left actually distorts and even makes up those unconnected and irrelevant incidents that form the fake caricature.

They accuse Judge Smith, for example, of failing to recuse himself soon enough in a 1997 lawsuit against an investment adviser who had defrauded school districts and municipalities. Some of the funds had been deposited in a bank employing Judge Smith's wife and in whose parent company the Smiths owned stock. Judge Smith did recuse himself a few weeks into the case. He did so on his own; neither party in the case asked him to. Nor was he required to because the bank was not a party in the case and his wife worked in an unrelated department. Yet Judge Smith's attackers know most normal folks don't know the vagaries and standards of judicial recusal decisions and won't be able to evaluate their false claims.

Judge Smith issued an order that half of the defendant's funds which had been frozen be distributed to the defrauded clients. His attackers' spin is that he maintained the freeze on the other half of the funds. Beyond being just a silly half-empty-or-half-full spin game, they never say that releasing the funds was not Judge Smith's idea at all. He approved the joint recommendation of the Securities and Exchange Commission and Richard Thornburgh, former Pennsylvania governor and U.S. attorney general, who had been appointed trustee and alone controlled the funds.

This pattern is clear and disturbing. Some Washington-based group makes a distorted and misleading charge, and those in Western Pennsylvania who know the truth have to set the record straight. Writing in the Feb. 17 Post-Gazette, two Democratic members of the Western Pennsylvania bar wrote that other deceptive claims by Judge Smith's attackers "are misinformed at best" and part of a "dangerous political strategy." Writing in the Feb. 14 issue, the Women's Bar Association of Western Pennsylvania endorsed Judge Smith "without reservation" in response to a feminist group's false claim.

The Washington Post's observation about the Pickering nomination applies across the board: "The need on the part of liberal groups and Democratic senators to portray him as a Neanderthal - all the while denying they are doing so - in order to justify voting him down is the latest example of the degradation of the confirmation process." Today's hearing on Judge Smith and Thursday's vote on Judge Pickering are the chance to change course before it's too late.

EXCERPT

A solid reputation We have been dismayed to read of the efforts of certain Washington-based lobbying groups that have mounted a campaign, largely on ideological grounds, against President Bush's recent nomination of U.S. District Judge D. Brooks Smith for a position on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ("Appeals Court Nominee Targeted," Feb. 9). Rules of judicial ethics make it very difficult for Judge Smith to defend himself against such charges.

As registered Democrats, and as trial lawyers who have practiced before and have known Judge Smith for a number of years, we believe that these groups with political agendas are completely out of line. Throughout his career, Judge Smith has demonstrated that he is an honest and hard-working jurist who does not have a political agenda and is completely without bias. His reputation among lawyers in this community is superb. He is regarded as bright, compassionate, careful, fair, objective, knowledgeable about the law, decisive, thorough, independent and unfailingly courteous to counsel and parties who appear before him.

Judge Smith embodies everything that a federal judge should be; he would be an outstanding member of the court of appeals.

Judge Smith Should Have Recognized This Conflict of Interest

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Richard A. Finberg's defense of a ruling by U.S. District Judge D. Brooks Smith in SEC vs. Black that advanced Mr. Finberg's clients' interests at the expense of other Pennsylvania school districts misses the point ("Judge Smith's Rulings in No Way Hint at Favoritism Toward Bank in Black Case," Feb. 22 letters).

In addition to the Oct. 27, 1997, partial distribution of assets discussed by Mr. Finberg, Judge Smith, on Oct. 30, denied motions by Penn Manor and other districts that were wise enough to stop John Gardner Black from depositing their money at Mid-State Bank. These districts demanded all their money back; Judge Smith gave them half, and only if they waived their right to challenge the freeze on the remaining money.

U.S. District Judge Donetta Ambrose, who took over the case in November 1997, ruled in May 1998 that the court had to release this non-Mid-State money. Denying an appeal brought by Mr.

A new Mississippi congressional map drawn by three Republican-appointed judges is moving closer to becoming a reality.

Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia denied an emergency appeal filed by an attorney who wants a Democrat-backed map drawn by a state judge. Scalia's denial on Tuesday came hours after the three federal judges in Jackson ordered that the state use their map. The lawyer, Robert McDuff of Jackson, immediately refiled his emergency appeal with Justice David H. Souter. McDuff said Souter can take up the appeal or, more likely, forward it to the full court.

"This is obviously a setback," said McDuff, who expected some word from the court within a week.

Mississippi was forced to give up one of its five U.S. House seats after Census figures showed slowing population growth in the 1990s.

The redistricting ended up in the courts after state lawmakers were unable to agree on their own map. Democrats sued in chancery court and Republicans sued in federal court.

Hinds County Chancery Judge Patricia Wise drew up the plan backed by Democrats, while the federal judges came up with their own.

In ordering that their map be used, the federal judges said it's unconstitutional for a chancery judge rather than the Legislature to draw a redistricting plan.

The federal judges said their plan would be used until the state produces a redistricting map that the Justice Department agrees is fair to minorities.

"We're obviously very pleased that the U.S. Supreme Court denied the emergency petition of the Democrats," said Grant Fox of Tupelo, an attorney who has represented Republicans in state and federal court redistricting fights.

No matter which plan is used, Rep. Chip Pickering, a Republican, and Rep. Ronnie Shows, a Democrat, will meet in a new consolidated district.

The federal judges' plan puts heavily Republican, suburban Jackson precincts in the new district where Pickering and Shows will face off.

Wise's plan puts those precincts in a district that dips down from northern Mississippi and gives the new district a higher concentration of black voters, who often vote Democratic.

Congressional candidates' qualifying deadline is Friday. Primaries are June 4 and the general election is Nov. 5.

Finberg and others, the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed, calling the continued freeze on these assets "improper."

Judge Smith's denial of Penn Manor's motion advanced the interests of Mr. Finberg's clients, who lost their money at Mid-State and who were seeking to have non-Mid-State districts share their $70 million in losses. Mr. Finberg advocated that all districts share the losses "pro-rata," a ruling that would have reduced the Mid-State districts' losses to about $34 million. This, in turn, would have significantly reduced the bank's exposure to losses in suits brought by its clients, claims the bank ultimately settled for $51 million.

No one has alleged that Judge Smith intentionally ruled the way he did to protect his wife's job or his stock interest in the bank. He may never even have recognized that his order accrued to Mid-State's benefit.

But the fact remains that, long after Judge Smith should have recognized that Mid-State Bank was involved in the fraud at issue in SEC vs. Black, he ruled on a contested motion in a way that advanced the bank's interests. This exacerbates the already serious legal and ethical issues that stem from Judge Smith's decision to issue orders in two cases involving the fraud perpetuated at the bank.

A Model of Fairness

February 26, 2002 Tuesday

I recently received the commentary written by Ken Gormley and Frederick W. Thieman regarding the appointment of Judge D. Brooks Smith to the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ("A Case Without Merit," Feb. 17 Forum).

I am a lawyer practicing in Blair County, where I have maintained a practice since 1975. During the late 1970s, Judge Smith and I served together in the Blair County district attorney's office.

Shortly after, he was appointed to head that office and later was appointed to the bench to fill a vacancy. When he ran for the office, I was his opponent. During this time, I came to know his abilities, legal and ethical.

Judge Smith has always been regarded by the Blair County bar as a judge with superior legal knowledge and fairness. Even during the time we were campaigning against each other, I continued to practice before him, never concerned that our opposition in the political arena would ever, in any way, influence his decision in any case brought before him.

He continues to be a credit to his community, and we take great pride in his accomplishments. His appointment to the 3rd Circuit would only enhance the quality of the federal judiciary, and I applaud the sentiments of Mr. Gormley and Mr. Thieman.

I would just like to expand their statement that "Judge Smith will be a credit to all lawyers, judges and citizens of Western Pennsylvania" to include some very proud lawyers, judges and citizens of Blair County.

Judging Judge Smith; He Owes the Senate An Apology of Black Cases

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette
February 26, 2002 Tuesday

Today the Judiciary Committee of the U.S. Senate is scheduled to hold a hearing on President Bush's nomination of D. Brooks Smith, the chief judge of the U.S. District Court here, to the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

A few weeks ago it looked as if the hearing would be a mere formality, despite some overheated objections from liberal interest groups to the confirmation of Judge Smith, who has broad support in the local legal community.

That all changed when one of those interest groups publicized the fact that Judge Smith was bafflingly slow to remove himself from two cases in which a bank that employed his wife -- and in which the couple owned at least $100,000 worth of stock -- was a major player.

The two cases, one a civil case brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the other a criminal trial, grew out of a fraud perpetrated on dozens of Pennsylvania school districts by John Gardner Black, a financial adviser now in a federal penitentiary. According to federal regulators, Black misled his clients and invested their funds in chancy securities. Much of the money entrusted to Black by several school districts was deposited at the Mid-State Bank, a prominent financial institution in Altoona, Judge Smith's hometown. In September 1997, after performing an audit, the SEC began proceedings to suspend Black's securities license and to have a court take control of the assets of his clients. The complaint mentioned that Black used several accounts at Mid-State.

Here is where the problem arises. Not only was Judge Smith's wife, Karen, a Mid-State officer, but also Judge Smith owned a significant amount of stock in the bank's holding company. Nevertheless, the judge did not immediately remove himself from the SEC case.

The Community Rights Counsel, a Washington-based public interest group that has criticized Judge Smith on other grounds, has constructed an elaborate explanation of how Judge Smith might have benefited financially from an order he issued maintaining a freeze on some school districts' assets not only in Mid-State but also in other banks. The group downplays the fact that the terms of Judge Smith's order were suggested by the SEC and former Gov. Dick Thornburgh, a trustee in the case.

But that's not the point. Under federal law, a judge must remove himself from a case in which he knows that he "has a financial interest in the subject matter in controversy or in a party to the proceeding or any other interest that could be substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding." A separate provision in federal law requires that a judge recuse -- that is, remove -- himself whenever his "impartiality might be reasonably questioned."

Judge Smith did just that in these two cases, but belatedly. In the civil case brought by the SEC in 1997, the judge issued more than a dozen orders before stepping down in favor of a colleague, but without citing his own financial interest in Mid-State Bank (which he did include in standard financial disclosure forms). In the 1999 criminal case against John Gardner Black, the judge complied with a request by Black's attorney that he recuse himself, but in doing so he again did not specify his financial interest in Mid-State.

Obviously, the Senate Judiciary Committee must question Judge Smith about his slowness to recuse himself. It may be that the judge was simply obtuse about appearances, or, convinced in his own mind that he would be impartial, he hesitated to turn work over to colleagues on an understaffed bench. Such explanations don't alter the fact that his slowness to pull out of these matters violates the spirit if not the letter of federal law. We hope Judge Smith acknowledges as much in his testimony before the Judiciary Committee.

That committee and the full Senate have the responsibility not only to scrutinize Judge Smith's conduct in these matters but also to weigh his qualifications as a whole. As Stephen Gillers, a professor of legal ethics at New York University, told the Post-Gazette: "The fact the judge has made a mistake of this kind is a fact the Senate should consider. But there are other factors that go on the scale."

Those other factors include the esteem in which Judge Smith is held by lawyers -- liberal and conservative, Republican and Democratic -- who have appeared before him. His legal philosophy is also a legitimate subject of inquiry, though the Judiciary Committee should be aware that lawyers in Pittsburgh dispute the depiction of Judge Smith as a conservative in the mold of Clarence Thomas or Antonin Scalia.

While it may have been the suspicion that Judge Smith was an extremist that inspired the Community Rights Counsel and other critics to launch a fishing expedition into his record, the fact is that they landed a big one in his conduct in the John Gardner Black cases. A judge with significant financial interest in a bank -- a bank that employs his wife -- should not be sitting in a case in which that bank is even a peripheral actor.

Judge Smith needs to make it clear to the Senate that, in retrospect, he realizes he should have refused from the outset to touch these matters with a 10-foot pole.

Setting the Record Straight on Judge D. Brooks Smith

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Today the Senate Judiciary Committee will consider President Bush's nomination of Chief U.S. District Judge D. Brooks Smith for the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, headquartered in Philadelphia.

For 18 years, Judge Smith has served Pennsylvanians with distinction. Judge Smith boasts first-rate credentials in addition to his years of judicial experience, and the American Bar Association unanimously gave him its highest rating. Over 100 Democrats and Republicans alike have signed letters of support to the Senate Judiciary Committee. These letters from judges, public officials and leaders of civil liberties, labor, and women's organizations all praise Judge Smith's fairness and impartiality. The Post-Gazette has detailed the campaign against Judge Smith by the Community Rights Counsel and other extreme interest groups. Just as night follows day, it seems the usual suspects are lining up for another effort to "Bork" a distinguished judge. Specifically, critics argue that Judge Smith should have immediately recused himself from a 1997 municipal fraud case involving an investment adviser later convicted of defrauding several Pennsylvania school districts. Critics say recusal was necessary as Judge Smith's wife worked at Mid-State Bank, where some of the defendants' assets were deposited, and the Smiths held stock in Mid-State's parent company.

Please allow me to set the record straight. I served as the trustee for the defrauded schools and bore a fiduciary duty to safeguard their funds. And I can say with front-row, firsthand knowledge that Judge Smith acted with absolute integrity, independence and honor.

First, Mid-State Bank was not a party to the case, and nothing at the outset suggested Mid-State was complicit in any fraudulent scheme. It was therefore unlikely that Judge Smith's wife, who worked in an unrelated part of the bank, would become a material witness. Since the complaint did not allege any wrongdoing by the bank holding the defendants' funds, any stock the Smiths owned in its parent company was immaterial. As trustee, I had sole possession of and control over the assets, and Judge Smith's initial order distributing 50 percent of frozen funds to defrauded school districts just approved an interim plan proposed jointly by me and the Securities and Exchange Commission while the case proceeded.

When Judge Smith later received information that Mid-State could, in the future, conceivably play a role in the litigation, out of an excess of caution he immediately recused himself sua sponte, without being asked by either party. The actions that Judge

Smith took prior to his recusal in the civil case did nothing to limit Mid-State's eventual liability exposure or impact the victims' rights of recovery.

In fact, the attacks by interest groups ignore the fact that no funds were even deposited at Mid-State at the time Judge Smith granted his last orders. As trustee, I had transferred the assets to another bank several days before this order. Nothing that occurred between this order and Judge Smith's recusal days later benefited Mid-State. Judge Donetta Ambrose, who obtained the case after Judge Smith's recusal, agreed. She wrote to the Senate Judiciary Committee to say, "There was never any suggestion by me or the Court of Appeals that Judge Smith acted inappropriately or unethically. Rather, he acted prudently and cautiously. . . . The allegations of unethical conduct in the context of this case are without foundation."

Partisan critics also improperly fault Judge Smith for temporarily handling a later criminal case against the investment adviser. Nobody involved in the case has alleged that Judge Smith issued any improper orders or took any inappropriate action. The case was assigned to Judge Smith only after lawyers in the case agreed that it was unrelated to the SEC's civil case. Mid-State Bank was not a party. The U.S. attorney's office never sought recusal, and defense counsel did not seek recusal until four months later, when Judge Smith immediately recused himself.

As governor of Pennsylvania in 1984, I had the honor of originally nominating Brooks Smith to sit on the Court of Common Pleas in Blair County. In 1988, while attorney general of the United States, I had the honor of seeing the U.S. Senate unanimously confirm Brooks Smith as a federal judge. This year, I hope to see the same Senate set aside the recent attacks of extreme interest groups and honor Judge Smith's long record of judicial service with a swift and unanimous approval to the 3rd Circuit.

By any measure of judicial merit, Brooks Smith is qualified to serve. Like the president who nominated him, Brooks Smith has rallied a broad coalition of support. It would be wrong to allow extreme interest groups to delay his confirmation by even one day. However, I am optimistic that this will not occur. Judge Smith acquired his reputation for honesty, uprightness and professionalism the old-fashioned way -- he earned it. And it will see him through.

Dick Thornburgh, a former governor of Pennsylvania, served as U.S. attorney general under Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Judge Smith and Pickering on their work; Choice of president's nominees should not be a political decision

Nor was he required to because the bank was not a party in the case and his wife worked in an unrelated department. Yet Judge Smith's attackers know most normal folks don't know the vagaries and standards of judicial recusal decisions and won't be able to evaluate their false claims.

Judge Smith issued an order that half of the defendant's funds which had been frozen be distributed to the defrauded clients. His attackers' spin is that he maintained the freeze on the other half of the funds. Beyond being just a silly half-empty-or-half-full spin game, they never say that releasing the funds was not Judge Smith's idea at all. He approved the joint recommendation of the Securities and Exchange Commission and Richard Thornburgh, former Pennsylvania governor and U.S. attorney general, who had been appointed trustee and alone controlled the funds.

This pattern is clear and disturbing. Some Washington-based group makes a distorted and misleading charge, and those in Western Pennsylvania who know the truth have to set the record straight. Writing in the Feb. 17 Post-Gazette, two Democratic members of the Western Pennsylvania bar wrote that other deceptive claims by Judge Smith's attackers "are misinformed at best" and part of a "dangerous political strategy." Writing in the Feb. 14 issue, the Women's Bar Association of Western Pennsylvania endorsed Judge Smith "without reservation" in response to a feminist group's false claim.

The Washington Post's observation about the Pickering nomination applies across the board: "The need on the part of liberal groups and Democratic senators to portray him as a Neanderthal - all the while denying they are doing so - in order to justify voting him down is the latest example of the degradation of the confirmation process." Today's hearing on Judge Smith and Thursday's vote on Judge Pickering are the chance to change course before it's too late.

Egg on the Brain

Katha Pollitt weighs in on recent news issues relating to reproductive freedom and the religious right

It may look as if domestic politics no longer exists in the new America--the one in which there is no money for anything besides guns and prisons but we don't care because we are all bowling together against the Axis of Evil. But that's not true. As long as there is a fertilized egg somewhere in this great land of ours, there will be domestic politics. George Bush may not be able to bring about the Kingdom of Heaven on Earth for the religious right, who gave him one in four of his votes. He may even realize that a serious victory for religious conservatives--significantly restricting the legality of abortion, say--would hurt the Republican Party, because California has more people than Utah. But he is doing what he can to keep the fundamentalists happy. It must be frustrating for him--just when we're all supposed to pretend to love our differently faithed neighbor even if we know he's bound for hell, Christians keep saying weird things. First there was Jerry Falwell's remark that God let terrorists blow up the World Trade Center because he was fed up with "the pagans, and the abortionists, and the feminists, and the gays and the lesbians...[and] the ACLU" Falwell apologized, only to express the same thought a bit more obliquely on November 11 at a Florida church: "If the church had been awake and performing that duty"--proselytizing the ungodly--"I can tell you that we wouldn't be in the mess we're in today." God, says Falwell, "even loves the Taliban"--it's just liberals he can't stand.

And then there's Attorney General John Ashcroft, who burqaed the semi-nude statue of the Spirit of Justice because he felt upstaged by her perky breast at press conferences, and who thinks calico cats are emissaries of the devil, when everyone knows it's black cats. Ashcroft is in trouble with Arab-Americans for offering this proof of the superiority of Christianity to Islam as quoted by conservative columnist Cal Thomas on his radio show on November 9 (and belatedly denied by a Justice Department spokeswoman): "Islam is a religion in which God requires you to send your son to die for him. Christianity is a faith in which God sends his son to die for you." Not to get too wound up in theology here, but if the Christian God sent his own son to die doesn't that make him, according to Ashcroft's definition, a Muslim?

Fortunately, the fertilized egg can be rolled onstage to distract us from such knotty questions. In keeping with the strategy of rebranding antichoice as prochild, the Bush Administration plans to use the CHIP program for poor children to provide healthcare to children "from conception to age nineteen," a neat way of defining zygotes as kids. The women in whom these fine young people are temporarily ensconced will remain uninsured--perhaps they can apply for federal funds by redefining themselves as ambulances or seeing-eye dogs. After all, somebody has to get those fetuses to the doctor's office. As for the 8 million uninsured postbirth children, not to mention the 27 million uninsured adults, who told them to leave the womb?

But wait, there's more. In a highly unusual move, the Justice Department has weighed in on the side of Ohio's "partial-birth abortion" ban, which has been on ice thanks to a federal court ruling that found it did not make enough allowance for a woman's health, as required by the 2000 Supreme Court decision in Carhart v. Nebraska. The Ohio law would permit the operation only to save her life or avoid "serious risk of the substantial and irreversible impairment of a major bodily function." Gee, what about considerable risk of moderate and long-term impairment of a bodily function of only middling importance? Should the Ohio state legislature (seventy-five men, twenty-four women) decide how much damage a woman should suffer on behalf of a fetus? Shouldn't she have something to say about it?

To please fanatical antichoice Representative Chris Smith of New Jersey, Bush is holding back $34 million from UN family planning programs. To return the favor, Congressional Republicans have revived the Child Custody Protection Act, which would bar anyone but a parent from taking a minor across state lines for an abortion. The parental-notification-and-consent laws of a pregnant teen's home state would follow her wherever she goes, like killer bees, or the Furies--and unlike any other law.

Bush is also stacking with social conservatives commissions that have nothing to do with abortion per se but raise issues of sex, gender and reproduction. The cloning commission, called the Council on Bioethics (fourteen men, four women), is headed by bioethicist Leon Kass, a former opponent of in vitro fertilization who's associated with the American Enterprise Institute. There's room around the table for antichoice columnist Charles Krauthammer antichoice law professor Mary Ann Glendon, the Vatican's representative at the UN conference on women, in Beijing and social theorist Francis Fukuyama, who wrote in a New York Times Op-Ed that the thirty-years-overdue introduction of the pill in Japan in 1999 spelled the downfall of the Japanese family, because now women will just run wild. But there are only four research scientists, and no advocates for patients with diseases that the cloning of stem cells might someday help cure. Similarly, the newly reconfigured AIDS commission is said to be stacked with religious conservatives and will be headed by former Representative Tom Coburn, whose claim to fame is his rejection of condoms, which sometimes fail, in favor of "monogamy," which never does.

Finally, there's the nomination of Charles Pickering for the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. Rated unqualified by the American Bar Association, Pickering, an ardent segregationist when it counted, opposed the ERA, has been a lifelong opponent of legal abortion and won't discuss his antichoice record in Senate hearings. The Fifth Circuit includes Texas, Louisiana and Mississippi, states where the right to abortion is already compromised by conservative legislatures in 1999 Texas tied with Michigan for most new antichoice laws enacted (seven). Traditionally the federal courts offer hope of redress for victims of state laws--in this case, some of the poorest women in the country. What are the chances that Pickering will champion their rights and their health?

My money's on the fertilized egg.

Judging personal beliefs

Thomas L. Jipping

Senate Democrats were to have continued their scorched-earth confirmation obstruction campaign today by defeating, on a straight party-line vote, the nomination of Charles Pickering to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. The final vote has been postponed until next week.

Appearing last Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat and Judiciary Committee member, predicted Judge Pickering's demise. That will be odd since several members of the committee helped unanimously confirm him to the U.S. District Court in 1990. The liberal American Bar Association – considered by Democrats the "gold standard" for evaluating judicial nominees – upped its rating from "qualified" in 1990 to "well qualified" today.

While you can't help but step in some hypocrisy like that in Washington, it's actually Sen. Feinstein's reason for opposing Judge Pickering that's significant. She opposes him because he has "right-wing views, both politically and personally." That's a lot more significant than it might sound.

If Judge Pickering were running again for the Mississippi State Senate, his political and personal views would obviously be relevant. A political candidate promises to translate those views into law. But why are political and personal views relevant to a judicial nominee? Like most liberals and some conservatives, Sen. Feinstein apparently sees no difference between judges and politicians. Political and personal views, rather than law, drive judicial decisions. Good judges have correct views and translate them into law.

Last year, though, Sen. Feinstein was among those lecturing John Ashcroft about putting aside the political and personal views he used as a legislator should he become attorney general. Those views, they said, are irrelevant in the executive branch, where he must enforce even laws with which he disagrees.

Political and personal views should be especially irrelevant to the judicial branch. As Chief Justice John Marshall wrote in Marbury vs. Madison, judges are there to say "what the law is," not what it should be. Judges don't make law, or even enforce it, so their political or personal views not only don't matter, they must not matter. Only then can the judiciary be, as America's founders intended and our liberty requires, the "weakest" and "least dangerous branch."

By saying what our laws mean, judges can say what our laws are. If anyone's political and personal views are to determine what our laws are, it's certainly not a small band of unelected judges. If "we the people" are to run the country and define the culture, judges must simply follow the law and leave the politics to us.

Scalia handles emergency appeals from the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas.

Scalia presided over Pickering's first swearing-in ceremony to Congress in 1997.

The justice also has spoken in Mississippi several times since the early 1990s. One trip in 1996 was arranged by Pickering's father, U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering, who is awaiting Senate action on his nomination to the 5th Circuit.

War begins over bench nominees

Peter Grier and Seth Stern
The Christian Science Monitor
February 27, 2002, Wednesday

The nomination of a little-known Mississippi judge to a federal appeals-court seat has mushroomed into the Bush administration's first big judicial-choice battle.

The fight over Charles Pickering Sr. hasn't reached the intensity of a full-scale struggle over a Supreme Court nominee, such as the one sparked by Clarence Thomas in 1991. But it does seem like something of a warm-up for skirmishes to come. All the familiar elements are there, from the pugnacious conservative Senate defenders to the attack coalition of liberal groups that says it is outraged by the nominee's past record.

There are some interesting twists on that lineup in this case - but more on that later. First, the main substantive issue. What's more important: the person Judge Pickering once was, or the man he has become?

A key Senate Judiciary Committee vote on the nomination could come this week.

"This is a very public debate over a candidate's record," says Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice, one of the groups that opposes the Pickering nomination.

Aron and other opponents say that Pickering's past actions position him far to the right of the American mainstream, particularly in regard to minority rights.

They point, for instance, to a 1959 law review article Pickering wrote suggesting changes in Mississippi's law banning interracial marriage that would make it more effective.

In 1964, critics add, Pickering - then a state senator - bolted the Democratic party in part because he opposed efforts to integrate the Mississippi delegation to the Democratic National Convention.

The controversy over Judge Pickering's nomination shows just what an "ugly affair" this can be. That's what the liberal Washington Post called it. Those "personal and political views" on which liberals base confirmation votes include religious views. The leftist People for the American Way's report on Judge Pickering focused on his Christian faith and church leadership. Translation: Conservative evangelical Christians hold incorrect views that disqualify them for judicial service. That's religious bigotry, and contrary to the Constitution's prohibition on a religious test for public office. But that type of intolerance and exclusion is inevitable when basing judicial selection decisions on a nominee's political and personal views.

Sen. Feinstein's criterion of political and personal views might sound familiar. Last year, Sen. Charles Schumer held hearings to promote his view that senators can base confirmation votes on a nominee's "ideology." Same thing. A judicial nominee's ideology will predict his rulings as a judge. Not surprisingly, Sens. Feinstein and Schumer were the first two Judiciary Committee Democrats to announce opposition to Judge Pickering.

Perhaps there's still a chance for Judge Pickering. In March 1997, Sen. Joseph Biden said that "it is not ... appropriate not to ... bring [nominees] to the [Senate] floor" for a vote. Maybe, just maybe, he will apply this same principle to Republican nominees as well. Whatever the outcome, the far-left gloves have come off and the response by the Bush administration and Senate Republicans will chart the road ahead.

The way out of this political and personal swamp is to refuse to muck around in it at all. Instead, Republicans must offer the American people a different view altogether of judges and how to choose them. That view is what America's founders offered, impartial judges who trust the people to make political decisions. Judges who do their job so we the people can do ours.

Kyl Lauds Confirmation of Tucsonan Cindy Jorgenson for Federal Judgeship, Senator Says Help is on the Way for Overworked Federal District Court.

WASHINGTON, D.C. - U.S. Senator Jon Kyl today commended the Senate for unanimously approving the nomination of Pima County Judge Cindy Jorgenson for a seat on the U.S. District Court for the District of Arizona.

"The good news for Arizona's overworked federal district court is that help is on the way," said Kyl today. "I am very pleased that the Senate has approved Judge Jorgenson's nomination to help ease the tremendous backlog of cases in Arizona, and look forward to filling the final vacancy on the court in the near future."

Judge Jorgenson is currently Presiding Judge for the family law bench at the Pima County Superior Court. Prior to her judgeship, she served as prosecutor in Tucson and became an Assistant United States Attorney in 1986. In 1995, Jorgenson received the Governor's Recognition Award for work on jury reform. She also was awarded the United States Department of Justice Special Achievement Award in 1987, 1989, 1991 and 1993. Judge Jorgenson is a graduate of the University of Arizona Law School.

Also today, the Senate Judiciary Committee held a hearing on Tucsonan David Bury to fill the remaining vacancy on the U.S. District Court. Mr. Bury is a founding partner and shareholder in the firm of Bury, Moeller, O'Meara & Gage P.C. of Tucson, Arizona. He has practiced as a trial lawyer for over 34 years.

Both Jorgenson and Bury were selected to fulfill vacancies that were deemed "judicial emergencies" by the administrative office of the courts.

FOX SPECIAL REPORT WITH BRIT HUME

EXCERPT

Brit Hume, James Rosen, Carl Cameron, Jim Angle, Bret Baier

HUME: The Justice Department issued a statement after the hearing expressing confidence in -- quote -- "the independence and absolute integrity of Deputy Attorney General Thompson" and said that ethics officials agreed that there is no basis to remove him from the Enron investigation.

Another Bush judicial nominee has faced tough questions from Senate Democrats. Judge Brooks Smith is the currently the chief federal judge for western Pennsylvania. And the president has nominated him to the federal appellate bench in Philadelphia.

Opponents say Smith failed to recuse himself in a timely fashion in certain cases where he had a conflict of interest. But his supporters, including the American Bar Association, say he's served with integrity.

Chief political correspondent Carl Cameron has the story. All right, we have got a little audio problem there. But we'll try to get that package ready to go and come back to you after a break.

Still to come also, the Pentagon's propaganda effort ends before it ever got started. We'll explain that after a break.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

HUME: We're going to take another crack at showing you Carl Cameron's report on Federal Judge Brooks Smith, whose confirmation hearing was held today. He is under attack from the left. Here's that report, we hope with sound.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CARL CAMERON, FOX NEWS CHIEF POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): U.S. District Judge D. Brooks Smith of Pennsylvania is the latest of President Bush's judicial nominees to face fierce opposition from liberal special interest groups. Legally, critics call him too conservative and pro-business. Democrat Joe Biden threaten to scuttle Smith's nomination to the Third Circuit Court of Appeals if he refused to answer any questions because he might someday have to rule on them.

SEN. JOSEPH BIDEN (D), DELAWARE: I will do everything in my power to defeat you, including moving to the Senate floor to take an action I've never taken in my life as a United States senator, a filibuster.

CAMERON: Biden's friction with Smith goes back to 1993 when Smith harshly criticized the senator's provision in the Violence Against Women Act that would have let the federal government decide which domestic violence laws states must enforce. Smith called it unconstitutional. And eventually, the Supreme Court agreed.

Biden said though that dispute is over, there are other concerns. Democrats cited a fraud case, involving the bank where Smith's wife was vice president and he had investments. He stepped aside when the conflict was discovered, but not soon enough for critics.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Would you like to explain why?

BROOKS SMITH, JUDICIAL NOMINEE: With the benefit of hindsight, I wish I had recused earlier. But I did recuse. And I did it because I knew it was the right thing to do.

CAMERON: Smith noted that parties to that case have never complained, only liberal outside groups opposed to his nomination. But Democrats zeroed in on the nominee's association with conservative outside groups and his acceptance of trips to their legal conferences. Smith called them educational seminars attended by most jurists and said they do not influence a judge's fairness.

SMITH: Federal judges are accustomed by training and by experience to hearing on a day-to-day basis different points of view. It's what we do. It's what we're about.

CAMERON: Republican Orrin Hatch accused liberal special interest groups of election year partisanship and mocked their objections to Smith's attendance at conservative functions.

SEN. ORRIN HATCH (R), UTAH: It seems that the criticism is not so much that you've attended some seminars, at least the outside criticism, but rather that you attended the wrong seminars. It's a terrible thing to do that, I'm sure. Of course, I'm being sarcastic.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

CAMERON: It actually took a minute for some in the room to realize that Hatch was joking, perhaps an indication that that might be, in fact, what's going on. Republicans are confident that ultimately that they will be able to get Smith's nomination confirmed.

That is not the case, however, for District Judge Charles Pickering, who was supposed to face a vote in the Senate Judiciary Committee this Thursday. That's now been put off until next week. And Republicans are increasingly pessimistic about being able to get that through, Brit.

HUME: Carl, thanks very much.

CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONY –Senator Patrick Leahy

Statement of Senator Patrick Leahy

Hearing on Judicial Nominations

February 26, 2002

I thank Senator Feingold for chairing this important hearing on judicial nominations.

The Judiciary Committee has continued to hold regular judicial nominations hearings throughout this session, as we have since the shift in majority last summer. We held the first January confirmation hearing in seven years on the second day of this session.

Today the Judiciary Committee holds its second February judicial confirmation hearing. In 1997, 1999 and 2001, the Republican majority held no confirmation hearings in either January or February. Today's hearing is the fourteenth hearing involving judicial nominations since the change in majority last summer. That is more hearings within the last seven months than the Republican majority ever held in any calendar year in which it was recently in the majority. Today's hearing follows the tradition of including a Court of Appeals nominee as well as a number of District Court nominees. Unfortunately, because the White House has been slow to send nominations to the many vacancies in the federal District Courts, the federal trial courts across the country, today's hearing includes a fewer number of District Court nominees than the Committee was willing to consider. Indeed, the Committee is virtually out of District Court nominees to include at such confirmation hearings. After today, 35 of the 36 District Court nominees with ABA peer reviews will have participated in hearings. We are in the process of scheduling a hearing on the most controversial District Court nominee currently pending.

Of course more than two-thirds of the federal court vacancies continue to be on the District Courts and 35 are still without a nominee. The Administration has acted very slowly in making nominations to the vacancies on the federal trial courts. In the last five months of last year, the Senate confirmed a higher percentage of the President's trial court nominees, 22 out of 36, than a Republican majority had allowed the Senate to confirm in the first session of either of the last two Congresses with a Democratic President.

Last year the President did not make nominations to almost 80 percent of the trial court vacancies that existed at the beginning of this year. As we began this session, 55 out of 69 District Court vacancies were without a nominee. Finally, in late January the White House sent up names for some of those trial court vacancies. Unfortunately, none have completed the paperwork needed to be included in hearings and none has yet received an ABA peer review.

Because the White House last year unilaterally changed the practice of nine Republican and Democratic Presidents and will no longer allow the ABA to begin its peer reviews during the selection process, ABA peer reviews on these new nominations are not likely to become available for some time to come. In the interim, we have already reached the point where the lack of available nominations for District Courts vacancies is holding back the number of judicial nominees the Judiciary Committee and the Senate could be considering. We experienced the same problem when the majority shifted last summer and we did not have enough District Court nominations ready for hearings in July through September last year.

After the Committee receives the indication that a judicial nominee has the support of his or her home state Senators and after the Committee has received ABA peer reviews, the nomination will then be eligible to be considered for inclusion in Committee hearings. Because the White House shifted the time at which the ABA does its evaluation of nominees to the post-nomination period, this year's nominees are unlikely to have completed files ready for evaluation until after the Easter recess. Of course, even then, over two and one-half dozen of the current federal trial court vacancies, 35, may still be without nominees.

To make real progress will take the cooperation of the White House. That is what I have been urging since the shift in majority. That is what I, again, called for when I spoke to the Senate on January 25, 2001. That cooperation is still not forthcoming.

We will make the most progress, most quickly if the White House would begin working with home state Senators to identify fair- minded, nonideological, consensus nominees to fill these court vacancies. One of the reasons that the Committee was able to work as quickly as it did and Senate was able to confirm 39 judges, as it has in the last seven months, was because those nominations were strongly supported as consensus nominees by people from across the political and legal spectrums.

I have heard of too many situations in too many states involving too many reasonable and moderate home state Senators in which the White House has demonstrated no willingness to work with home state Senators to fill judicial vacancies cooperatively. As we move forward, I have urged the White House to show greater inclusiveness and flexibility and to help make this a truly bipartisan enterprise. Logjams exist in a number of settings. To make real progress, repair the damage that has been done over previous years, and build bridges toward a more cooperative process, there is much that the White House could do to work more cooperatively with all home state Senators, including Democratic Senators.

In addition, as I have noted, the White House could help speed the Committee process if it would restore the ABA peer review participation to an earlier stage in the process. For more than 50 years the ABA was able to conduct its peer reviews simultaneously with the FBI background check procedures. This meant that when nominations were sent to the Senate, the FBI report and informal ABA peer review were completed and followed very quickly. Together with the endorsement of the nominee's home state Senators, the basic requirements of the nominations file were available to be reviewed by the Committee much more quickly than they are now. This process allowed hearings to be scheduled soon after nominations were received in many instances. One of the consequences of the White House's unilateral decision last year to discontinue this longstanding bipartisan practice is that nominations are now not available to be considered or scheduled for hearings until many weeks have passed and these basic background materials can be assembled and submitted to the Committee. That is unfortunate and unnecessary.

There were occasions last year when we proceeded with hearings including fewer District Court nominees than I would have liked because recent nominees' files were not yet complete. I noted in my statement to begin this year that I feared that same circumstance being repeated this year. It already is. That is regrettable.

I have urged the White House to rethink its recent changes in traditional practices that were initially instituted by President Eisenhower and worked well for Presidents Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon, Ford, Carter, Reagan, (George Herbert Walker) Bush and Clinton. I suggest that the White House reconsider the delays caused by the abandonment of the traditional practice and that this Administration consider returning to the tried and true practice of sharing information with the ABA earlier in the process so that it can begin and complete its peer reviews by the time the nomination is made to the Senate.

Just as no Senator is bound by the recommendations of the ABA, so, too, the White House can make clear that it is reinstituting the traditional practice not because it intends to be bound by the results of that peer review or even take it into account, but solely to remove an element of delay that its actions introduced into the confirmation process. The White House can expressly ask the ABA not even to send the results of its peer review to the Executive Office, but only transmit them to the Committee, if it chooses. Whether or not the White House considers the ABA peer reviews, they are considered by many judicial nominations as an indication that they merit the Senate's support. On the other hand, the fact that they are advisory and not binding on Senators is seen from the recent action confirming a nominee who received a "not qualified" rating from the ABA and the many nominees of this Administration who have been confirmed with mixed ratings.

As Chairman, I have sought to work with all Senators. In scheduling hearings for nominations, chairmen traditionally consider a number of factors, including the consensus of support for the nominee, the needs of the court to which the person is nominated, and the interests of the home state Senators. We have a number of nominees for whom individual Senators have expressed personal interest. I will continue to take that into account and seek to accommodate Senators in as orderly a process as possible.

Judicial nominations have never been scheduled for hearings based solely on the date of their nomination. Certainly there was no first-in-first-out rule during the six and one-half years that preceded my chairmanship, when it could take years to get a hearing and more than 50 judicial nominees never received a nominations hearing at all.

I hope to integrate a number of nominations received before I became Chairman into hearings throughout this session. I anticipate that not all those nominations will be regarded as consensus candidates. We can anticipate that the more controversial nominations will occasion more review and more Senators raising questions that concern them during the course of our hearings.

In our first full week in session we proceeded with a hearing on the nomination of Judge Charles Pickering to the 5th Circuit. Senator Lott is very supportive of this nomination and even though his was not among the first sent to the Senate by President Bush last spring, we have tried to move forward to consideration of the nomination in recognition of the strong interest of the Republican leader.

Similarly, I knew of Senator Specter's strong interest in the Committee scheduling a hearing as soon as possible on the nomination of Judge D. Brooks Smith to a vacancy on the 3rd Circuit. Judge Smith was not nominated until September 10 and the Committee did not receive his peer review from the ABA until October 31, 2001. Although there were 44 judicial nominees nominated before Judge Smith, of which several remain pending, I have sought to accommodate Senator Specter by including Judge Smith in our hearing today. Of course, the previous nominee for this vacancy was Judge Robert Cindrich, also a District Judge in the Western District of Pennsylvania. Although he was nominated in February 2000, received a well qualified peer review rating by the ABA and was pending for more than 10 months, he was never included in a confirmation hearing. His nomination was returned to the President without any action having been taken by the Senate.

Likewise, other Senators, Republicans and Democrats, have asked me to give priority to various nominees. Senator Enzi requested attention to the nomination of Terrence O'Brien to the 10th Circuit, for example, and I will be trying to accommodate him, as well. I tried to take those requests into account in the last seven months and expect to continue to do so. Such interest was a factor in the scheduling of hearings for Judge Prost to the Federal Circuit, Judge Gregory to the 4th Circuit, Judge Clement to the 5th Circuit, Judge Riley to the 8th Circuit, Judge Harris to the 10th Circuit and Judge Melloy to the 8th Circuit.

It was considered in the cases of Judge Mills in Mississippi, Judge Wooten in South Carolina, Judge Robinson in Kansas, the four judges the Senate confirmed last year for Oklahoma, the three judges the Senate confirmed for Kentucky, the two judges the Senate confirmed for Montana, the two judges the Committee confirmed for Alabama, and in connection with many of the 44 judicial nominees on whom the Committee has been holding hearings in the last seven months.

I expect to continue to try to accommodate Senators from both sides of the aisle in this regard. In so doing, I have tried to be forthright with Senators if a nominee has generated concerns. Not all of the judicial nominations scheduled for hearings have been without detractors, many are proving to be controversial.

A general impression, heightened by the White House's refusal to work cooperatively with some home state Democratic Senators in spite of precedent in that regard and its disdain for suggestions to proceed to assemble recommendations through bipartisan commissions as has been the tradition in many States, such as mine, is that the White House and some in the Senate are intent on an ideological takeover of the courts. With the Circuits so evenly split in so many places, nominees to the Courts of Appeals may have a significant impact on the development of the law for decades to come. Some of us are concerned that the Administration not orchestrate a roll back in the protections of individual rights, civil rights, consumer rights and privacy rights through its judicial nominations.

In addition to Judge Smith of Pennsylvania, this hearing includes another nominee to a District Court vacancy in Arizona, the third included in a hearing since the shift in majority last summer, another nominee for a District Court vacancy in Texas after the confirmation of Judge Martinez earlier this year, and a nominee for a vacancy in Alaska whose file was not completed until this year. I give my thanks to all Senators who have worked with the Committee to schedule this confirmation hearing and especially to Senator Feingold for chairing today.

Alliance For Justice Raises Serious Concerns About Judge D. Brooks Smith, His Nomination To U.S. Court Of Appeals For 3rd Circuit

Nan Aron

U.S. Newswire

February 26, 2002 Tuesday

Following is a statement by Nan Aron, president, Alliance for Justice:

Like many of President Bush's nominees to the federal judiciary, Pennsylvania district court Judge D. Brooks Smith's record raises troubling concerns across a wide spectrum of legal issues including those affecting workers, the disabled, and the environment. He is emblematic of President Bush's nominees who will turn back the clock on progress Americans cherish.

In order for the Senate to make a judgment on any federal judge, that nominee's record must be thoroughly reviewed. Judge Smith appears to have a large body of unpublished opinions. In his over 13 years on the bench, Judge Smith has been reversed 52 times, with published opinions in only six of those cases. This suggests strongly that he has issued a large number of unpublished opinions overall, the vast majority of which have been unavailable for review. And the rulings that are available for review show a disturbing pattern of bias in favor of powerful interests and disregard for the rights and protections of ordinary Americans.

Judge Smith also spoke out against the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) in a speech to the Federalist Society in 1994. His views on the division of power between states and the federal government are antithetical to many of our country's civil rights and environmental protections and if he were to issue decisions as an appellate judge that reflected those views, the effect could be a further dismantling of critical laws passed by Congress to ensure these protections.

The U.S. Senate must insist on its constitutional, co-equal role and work to maintain a fair and independent judiciary. No nominee is presumptively entitled to a lifetime seat on the federal judiciary. It is the nominee's duty and obligation to prove that he or she is fit to serve this esteemed, lifetime judgeship. Their record must be an open-book so the Committee has the tools necessary to decide whether or not to confirm.

We need fair judges. We need compassionate judges. We need judges not afraid to publish an opinion because they know their reasons will stand up to scrutiny.

Alliance for Justice urges the Senate Judiciary Committee to undertake a thorough review of Judge Smith's record before voting on whether to confirm.

Since his appointment to the federal bench, he has criticized the creation of largely African-American political districts as a means to remedy past racial discrimination. Critics question his record on job discrimination and other civil rights cases.

"The bottom line is that we believe he is a right-wing ideologue," says Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way.

Pickering's defenders point out that many of the objections to his record deal with items in the long-ago past, when white Southern politicians operated in a very different political context.

Nor do the criticisms tell the whole story, they say. In 1967 Pickering lost a reelection race for county attorney after testifying against a Ku Klux Klan leader on trial for killing a civil rights leader.

Furthermore - and here's where the twist part comes in - the black establishment in Pickering's hometown of Laurel, Miss., overwhelmingly supports his elevation to the appeals bench. They consider him someone who has at least tried to foster racial reconciliation by supporting the funding of medical clinics in poor districts, and other actions.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has received some 27 letters of support for Pickering from members of the African-American community, said Sen. Orrin Hatch (R) of Utah, ranking GOP member of the panel, at the opening of a Feb. 7 hearing on the nomination. "Those fighting Pickering's nomination, in contrast, seem to consist primarily of a host of Washington lobbyists," said Sen. Hatch.

A FEW years ago, the Pickering nomination might have attracted much less attention. It doesn't involve the power and prestige of the Supreme Court, for one thing.

As a close friend of the top-ranking Republican in the Senate, Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi, he might reasonably have expected to be whooped through confirmation on grounds of senatorial courtesy.

But the bitter battles over such high court picks as Robert Bork, the Reagan nominee who was defeated in 1987, and Clarence Thomas, the eventually-confirmed choice of George H. W. Bush, have left behind an ideological infrastructure of judicial confrontation.

Both conservative and liberal groups have institutionalized "opposition research" for court nominees, consisting of detailed scrutiny of past decisions and writings, including unpublished ones. The result: a sort of rote warfare that now extends down several layers deep into choices for lower-level federal courts.

Pickering is not the only appeals court pick who will face opposition, for instance. Nominee D. Brooks Smith, a Pennsylvania judge, is now facing charges of misconduct involving financial Thought this was pretty good, in case you haven't seen.

Marc, I think we need to have another call on this. I'd like to bring everyone up to date on our conversations with Schumer's office.

Also, what would the group think about my setting up a meeting with Bob Hunter of CFA to talk with him and try to share perspectives? His skepticism on this issue is hurting us with some of the key players on the Dem side. I think it would be helpful to have White House representation at such a meeting.

Let me know.

Assessing Terror and Related Legislative Risks

- Earnings and valuation risks are real
We assess potential impact on real estate, banking, brokerage and nonlife insurance sectors of another 9/11-size attack and the government response.
- Current valuations don't seem to reflect attack risk
In all these sectors, we think current valuations do not reflect impact of another attack without a terrorism bill in place.
- Insurance stocks most vulnerable to attacks with no bill
Insurers, lacking data, may be allowing exposures to expand with insufficient safeguards; reinsurers are managing exposures better.
- REITs are caught in the middle
Lenders and insurers can impose higher rates, and REITs and landlords can pass along only some of the increased costs.
- Capital markets-focused firms seem least exposed
Fallout on borrowers could ripple through mortgage-backed market; however, investment banks could come up with innovative products as alternatives.

Potential winners/losers. We believe all REITs would experience significant negative short-term valuation impacts if a terror attack were to occur in the absence of any terrorism insurance legislation. Investor fears about further equity losses in the event of future attacks, potentially unavailable terrorism insurance, higher borrowing spreads and the limited availability of debt capital would cause significant multiple contraction. This phenomenon would likely occur most for the most sensitive property sectors. These negative effects would likely be greatly mitigated if the federal government were to quickly enact a terrorism insurance backstop/bailout following the second attack.

Scenario 4: A bill is passed, an attack occurs. Despite the passage of a terrorism bill, whereby there is a federally funded backstop, we believe overall costs of obtaining insurance after an attack will likely rise — particularly for the affected asset type(s). From the landlord's perspective, we believe the impact from this scenario includes:

- Higher property operating expenses
- Higher borrowing costs on debt renewal, as the asset class is seen to be riskier, both in the CMBS and corporate borrowing arena
- Security costs rise again.
- The secured lending market would probably become even more focused on adequate insurance coverage for loan collateral.

Potential winners/losers. The passage of a terrorism insurance bill (and the more extensive, affordable terrorism insurance and debt capital) likely would not prevent some negative valuation impact if another terror attack were to occur. In this case, we believe REITs with skyline and high profile assets would clearly be most impacted, while their lower profile peers would likely be spared. It is worth mentioning, however, that the more sensitive companies would likely be deemed winners in between the passage of the insurance bill and the actual attack.

Banks, Brokers and Asset Managers

Initial Conclusions. We think that investors may be too focused on credit issues (Enron, K-Mart and now Global Crossing) and off-balance sheet disclosures to think about the implications of the passage / non-passage of the terrorism bill. We do not fault them, but we do believe that the outcome of the terrorism bill legislation could have a significant impact on banking and brokerage stocks. A key issue, as we see it, is whether lenders will continue to lend to what are perceived to be high-risk properties if the real estate companies cannot secure adequate insurance protection. Also, if the commercial mortgage-backed market does slow, what does this mean for trading profits for the BIG fixed income players in this area?

In evaluating the possible impact on the stocks in our universe based on the four scenarios, our primary conclusion is that in all scenarios, capital markets based firms seem to fare slightly better than the credit sensitive firms (except if a major terrorist attack does irrevocable damage to the securities industry's infrastructure).

On the other hand, we do think that traditional lending companies face marginal risks if the bill is not passed and another attack occurs. Under this scenario, more properties would be damaged potentially limiting the repayment of those loans to some banks and the insurance industry may become increasingly fragile limiting the effectiveness of current insurance policies. Longer term, credit spreads against commercial real estate would also likely rise, although the positive impact to the income statement would be offset by a slower pace of real estate activity.

According to Betsy Daniels, who is working on picking up the regional banks, banks are thinking through how they want to approach lending in a world without terrorism coverage on property. There is no "one-size-fits-all" approach. The banks can take several paths, ranging from renewing the loan, changing the terms on the loan, asking the borrower to get a terrorism rider, asking the borrower to self-insure for terrorism, or pulling the loan. Banks are choosing what makes sense for them given their business mix and risk appetite and decisions are likely to be made on a loan-by-loan basis. The key point is that the banks are thinking about these issues and are trying to create a game-plan to limit their exposure to further terrorist property destruction.

These issues are more likely to impact the traditional lending companies than the capital markets companies. Construction and commercial real estate loans were 19.5% of total average loans at US commercial banks as of September 30, 2001. At JPM and Citigroup, though, these loans represent just a fraction of overall business. Indeed, based on our analysis, we think that around 0.99% of Citi's total loans are related to domestic real estate, while we believe that 2.27% of JPM's total loans are related to domestic real estate (at the end of 3Q01, latest available data). At the moment, we retain our Neutral rating on JPM and maintain our Outperform on Citigroup.

Within the brokerage sector, we think that Lehman Brothers (LEH, $56, Outperform-V, target $73) and Goldman Sachs (GS, $81, Outperform-V, target $92) are most levered to the commercial mortgage back industry (which would obviously slow if real estate companies were not able to obtain financing at will), ranking second and fourth, respectively, in U.S. public and Rule 144A CMBS (collateralized mortgage backed securities) offerings. However, Goldman is traditionally not a major player in this market (i.e., the company had some big trades at the end of the 2001 that boosted it in the rankings). Separately, Credit Suisse First Boston (a unit of Credit Suisse), ranked first in this CMBS market in 2001. All told, according to Thomson Financial Securities Data, $63.0 billion of CMBS were offered in 2001 (Exhibit 8).

Interest rate impact. Looking at the big picture, we also are intrigued by the possible impact of the passage of the terrorism bill on the treasury market. If the terrorism bill is passed, the Federal Government becomes the reinsurer of terrorism related risks. Would government bondholders demand a terrorism risk free premium? If yes, then would the long-term benchmark risk free rate rise significantly? An increase in the benchmark rate would increase lending costs for all borrowers, which could be a negative for companies with high leverage ratios. Also, if real estate companies (REITS) were not able to secure mortgage financing and had to use the capital markets via straight debt issuance, we actually think that this opportunity could be an interesting one for the capital markets that we cover, particularly firms with a strong presence in the investment grade market.

Scenario Analysis: Banks and Brokers

Scenario 1: A bill is in place, no attack occurs. We believe that the passage of the bill with no incidence of further terrorist attacks in the near future would be a marginal positive for the credit sensitive names like C and JPM. Key to our thinking is government protection would allow lenders to still allocate capital to real estate companies with little residual impact from “event risks” like the tragic events of September 11, 2001. Separately, we believe that this scenario would entail healthier economic growth and stronger equity markets (due to the absence of any external shocks) — a significant positive for the broker/dealers and equity focused asset managers in our universe. In addition, the factors favoring economic growth (lower costs of doing business — specifically, insurance and security costs) would also positively impact the expense lines for all the stocks we cover. However, we do expect a marginal increase in documentation costs for banks as lending agreements incorporate various terrorism related clauses, and a marginal increase in insurance rates for policyholders.

Potential winners/losers. We think that this scenario would be a marginal positive for all the stocks in our group for the reasons highlighted above. As such, under this scenario, we do feel comfortable reiterating our investment thesis: From a macro perspective, we continue to believe that capital markets firms outpace credit sensitive and fee-based companies. In diversified financials we continue to favor Citigroup (C, $44, Outperform, target $59) over JPMorgan Chase (JPM, $29, Neutral). In the small cap asset management arena, we remain bullish across the board: Affiliated Managers (AMG, $67, Outperform, target $73), BlackRock (BLK, $44, Outperform, target $48), Waddell & Reed (WDR, $30, Outperform, target $35), and Federated Investors (FIL, $31, Strong Buy, target $35). Finally, we have a mixed bag on the Arms Dealers. Specifically, we like companies like Investment Technology Group (ITG, $45, Outperform, target $46) (play on cost, speed, globalization, and value-added), while we remain cautious on other names, including Instinet (INET, $7, not rated).

Scenario 2: No bill is passed, no attack occurs. Our second scenario would essentially entail continuation of the status quo (we don't have a terrorism bill and fortunately there have been no more terrorist attacks). As we think that investors in our stocks have not yet focused on these issues, we do not expect any major impact on stock prices. However, we expect companies to spend more on security especially since terrorism related insurance coverage would be more difficult to secure.

Lenders continue to expect insurance against terrorist acts on the credits they extend — either through insurance policy coverage or through borrower self-insurance. Some lenders may look to cash in some of their “bad chips” by charging higher rates or refusing to extend funds to some credits on the grounds that they are not willing to underwrite loans that do not have terrorism related coverage. We believe that lenders may selectively take this approach towards certain credits. We do not expect widespread application, as it would result in the lender self-selecting out of the real estate lending market. Targeted pruning could marginally improve asset quality at some lenders.

Another related development would be a slowdown in some sectors of the CMBS market — especially for securities backed by high profile assets like tall office buildings and big regional malls. As a result we expect real estate firms to borrow funds at the corporate level rather than accessing capital markets through asset backed securities leading to a 20 to 30 basis point increase in their cost of funds. We think that investment banks will look upon this development as an opportunity and would come up with innovative financial products to solve the financing needs of real estate firms.

Scenario 3: No bill is in place, an attack occurs. Our third scenario, which is also our worst case scenario, evaluates the impact of a major terrorist attack in case the terrorism bill has not been passed. As in scenario 4, the development could be a significant negative for firms like GS, MER ($47), and LEH if it leads to another disruption in the nation's capital markets. For the credit sensitive names, we expect major credit losses as a direct result of the attack as most exposures would not be backed by insurance. In addition, the shock to the economy could lead to a deterioration in the overall credit situation, driving both provisions and credit costs materially higher. The shock to the equity markets could also depress earnings at capital markets based firms and equity focused asset managers. The occurrence of another attack would also lead to increased security expenses by businesses.

Potential winners/losers. We believe that credit sensitive names will come under the most pressure under such a scenario. Although we believe that the federal government would intervene to prevent a breakdown of the financial system, we believe that credit sensitive names could experience a “double whammy”. Specifically, in addition to the direct credit losses they would experience as a result of the attack, the external shock to the nation's economy would increase credit costs going forward (even if the companies had no exposure to the areas/ businesses directly impacted by the attack). We would expect capital markets

Scenario 4: A bill is passed, an attack occurs. Irrespective of whether a terrorism bill has been passed, we believe that the initial reaction of the market will be negative for most of the stocks in our coverage universe. The development could be a significant negative for capital markets based firms if it leads to another disruption in the nation's capital markets.

However we do not expect any major credit losses at the credit sensitive firms as a direct result of the attack as most exposures would be backed by insurance. That said the shock to the economy could lead to a deterioration in the overall credit situation, leading to higher credit costs at the firms we cover. In addition, the shock to the equity markets could depress earnings at capital markets based firms and equity focused asset managers. The occurrence of another attack would also lead to higher insurance rates for policyholders and increased security expenses by businesses.

Potential winners/losers. If the attack does not lead to a disruption in the nation's capital markets and equity markets rebound soon after the attack, we believe that capital markets firms will outperform credit sensitive and fee-based companies (as happened after 9/11). We also expect capital markets firms to outperform other financials, as the rebuilding effort would require a significant amount of capital to be raised. We think that the attack could amount to another external shock to the nation's economy, leading to a deterioration in credit that could raise credit costs at Citigroup and JPMorgan Chase. Within the credit sensitive names, we would expect firms with better credit management practices to significantly outperform their peers because of two reasons: 1) they would have pruned their uninsured terrorism risk exposure, and 2) they would also have lower credit costs if the economy were to head into a recession.

The Property/Casualty Sector

As noted in the February 22, 2002, issue of P/C Insurance & Risk Briefing, we believe the equity markets generally do not appear to be discounting in insurers' material risk from terrorism in the absence of a terrorism bill. Nevertheless, we believe many primary commercial lines insurers (and, to Financial Institutions – February 27, 2002 a lesser extent, personal lines insurers) retain considerable residual terrorism risk. Therefore, we believe that investors need to reconcile their willingness to accept terrorism risk, other offsetting factors they may find attractive in a stock, and their return requirement.

Initial conclusions. We believe that most primary insurers and some reinsurers cannot adequately measure their exposure aggregations from a hypothetical event. They are only just beginning to gather exposure information, such as employee locations for workers' compensation. Meantime, virtually all primary insurers talk about limiting exposure as much as they can, but they do not provide enough information to determine how a particular insurer would fare under a worst-case scenario. They do not, for example, provide a probable maximum loss estimate (PML) as they ordinarily do with other types of catastrophic risks. Nor are we aware of any insurer taking an across-the-board approach of simply non-renewing policies without terrorism losses excluded.

Insurers imposing exclusions using nonadmitted policy forms are assuming that the ban on exclusions in some states is trumped by their nonadmittance status. There is a slight risk, however, that policyholders and regulators might challenge that interpretation in an effort to broaden available coverage after the fact. We also believe insurers are assuming they can invoke the war exclusion in another attack; however, we assume that issue would ultimately be litigated. Additionally, we believe that the primary exclusions that have been approved may be insufficient to prevent insurer insolvency, especially for insurers that write workers' compensation, group life, and significant amounts of property insurance (Exhibits 9 and 10).

In short, we think investors cannot assess the risk of terrorism in a portfolio of insurance stocks any better than an insurer can assess the terrorism risk in its insurance portfolio. However, investors can control their exposure to risk, by limiting the amount they invest in such stocks to an amount within their risk tolerance from such an event. Accordingly, we are not averse to investing in terrorism-exposed insurance stocks, but we believe investors should not over-concentrate in these stocks. We also believe that investors should require a higher return in exchange for this additional, and unquantifiable, risk. Comparisons to historical valuations should take note of this higher level of risk. We would consider stocks with the same valuation as pre-9/11 as now more "expensive."

This approach to investing is similar to one we would follow for cat-exposed insurers that do not buy earthquake or hurricane reinsurance, although with added uncertainties:

1) we do not know as much about the level of risk for individual insurers as we normally do for other types of catastrophic risks; 2) we know nothing about the overall frequency and severity of terrorism risk.

Scenario Analysis: Property/Casualty Insurers

Scenario 1: A bill is in place, no attack occurs. This is the second-best scenario for short-term earnings and the best case for valuation. Reinsurers and property insurers would have greater certainty about their exposures and could price accordingly.

While rates might not rise as sharply as without a bill, the existence of a federal backstop would remove a large balance sheet vulnerability. Under this scenario, we assume no WTC-size event occurs this year, presumably giving insurers that much time to rebuild surplus — including additional capital-raising. Brokers' earnings upside from commissions and fees might be slightly muted, taking their portion of rates that might not be as sharply higher as they would be without a terror bill. Valuations could probably be higher with a terror bill in place because of the perception of reduced shock-loss risk and volatility. However, since we believe the market is not discounting terrorism risk, the impact could be limited.

Potential Winners/Losers. Our current market-weight position on the brokers would stand. For the commercial primary insurers, this could be a positive, removing the uncertainty. Our position on the reinsurers would also shift toward the positive.

Scenario 2: No bill is passed, no attack occurs. This is the best-case scenario from an earnings perspective in the short term and the second-best scenario from a valuation perspective. It is also the current scenario, and our current market-weight position on the commercial insurance industry reflects this status quo. In our view, this is a positive for reinsurers and brokers and for property insurers on non-customized coverages. Insurers and reinsurers are charging steeper rates for more restricted coverage of an unpredictable risk that under this scenario does not recur this year.

Potential winners/losers. We think that only the most disciplined commercial insurers and reinsurers with the strongest balance sheets, best ratings and compelling valuations are desirable amid the protracted uncertainty of no federal backstop and no guarantees that terrorists will never again strike with the ferocity of 9/11. We are skeptical that exclusions will remain as firm as they are currently.

Scenario 3: No bill is in place, an attack occurs. Rates likely would soar, we believe, along with demand, but capacity would likely shrink as losses mounted. Earnings, in our view, would be depressed for many large commercial insurers and reinsurers, and net investment income would come under pressure from the likely impact on capital markets in the wake of another attack. The government might step in with some form of emergency funding, with an uncertain and possibly inequitable impact. The capital markets might be reluctant after the second major attack to commit another round of funding. In a second attack, some of the stronger players, in our view, could have impaired balance sheets and have difficulty maintaining their financial strength and credit ratings. A capacity crisis could develop. The post-9/11 measures taken to limit exposures would probably have a minimal effect, because we think those measures would not have had a chance to permeate insurers entire books. The following legal questions could quickly arise under this scenario:

- Was the attack an act of war, and excludable?
- Might states try to force policies written on an excess & surplus lines basis to cover terrorism after the fact?
- Would anyone bear liability exposure?
- Would Congress be more inclined to grant liability relief from terrorism-related events?
- Would foreign insurers and reinsurers doing business in the US follow US laws and practices?

Potential winners/losers. We would expect reinsurance and insurance broker stocks to gain under this scenario and primary insurer stocks to lose. We think reinsurers, which are not subject to state regulation on terrorism coverage exclusions, have generally been reducing their exposures to terror risk faster than primary writers and writing new contracts that offer more limited coverages at high rates. Brokers, again as the intermediaries, would benefit from what we think would be another surge in rates, as well as demand. Primary insurers, in our view, would be much more vulnerable, having achieved limited success in excluding terrorist losses and in finding affordable, effective reinsurance.

Scenario 4: A bill is passed, an attack occurs. This could actually be one of the better scenarios for earnings, again depending on the shape of the bill passed, and third best for valuation. We view this scenario as a net positive. Underwriters would know exactly where their exposures begin and end, and could price and set deductibles, limits and exclusions more accurately. Yet the private market would still bear the insurable portion of the risk.

Potential winners/losers. We assume the impact on insurers and reinsurers would be far more predictable than without a bill—analogueous to any other catastrophe (i.e., positive).

V = More volatile. We estimate that this stock has more than a 25% chance of a price move (up or down) of more than 25% in a month, based on a quantitative assessment of historical data, or in the analyst's view, it is likely to become materially more volatile over the next 1-12 months compared with the past three years. Stocks with less than one year of trading history are automatically rated as more volatile (unless otherwise noted). We note that securities that we do not currently consider "volatile" can still perform in that manner.

Assessing Terror and Related Legislative Risks

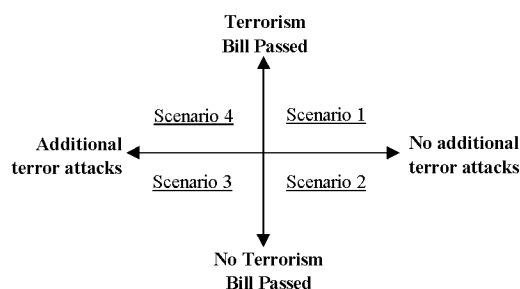

Summary

September 11 changed the world's perception of risk. Insurers and reinsurers were the first to react, moving to exclude losses from future terrorist attacks in policy language. Congress immediately began work on a bill to provide the coverage but failed to pass legislation before year-end. The issue is back before Congress but passage of a bill is uncertain. Whether another terrorist attack occurs with or without a bill in place has significant implications for the banking, brokerage, asset management, real estate and insurance industries' earnings and valuations.

Morgan Stanley's analysts who cover these sectors have produced this report to weigh the likely impact on these sectors of a federal terrorism insurance bill passing or not, depending on whether another World Trade Center-size attack occurs in the US. (For discussion purposes, we are ignoring the worst-case scenario of a major nuclear, chemical or bio-terrorism attack because of the enormous, unpredictable consequences on the economy and society. Only the government can address this risk, in our view.) We assume that if a bill were to pass, it would resemble some compromise between the current House bill and last year's failed Senate version (under which the federal government would pay as much as $90 billion of terror attack losses over a three-year period, with insurers paying the first $10 billion of losses). Our aim is to identify the degree to which stocks are discounting in terrorism and the winners and losers under the four possible scenarios (Exhibit 1):

Source: Morgan Stanley Research

without action from the Senate). No follow-up massive attack has occurred although some seem to have been averted (and investors — and even some businesses — seem to be assuming that none will occur any time soon). The government has indicated that terrorism remains a very real risk, and our aim is to provide investors with a framework for thinking about the implications of the four possible scenarios, without necessarily assigning probabilities to whether a bill will pass or another massive attack occurs.

The 9/11 event by itself showed that the terrorists are much more coordinated, capable and determined than was generally thought prior to the event. Since then, the government's stepped-up efforts to gather intelligence has turned up new evidence that the terrorists are determined to plan and execute additional attacks. Preventive efforts also have been ramped up and appear to have thwarted some attacks. The risk of terrorism should be reduced over time; however, in a recent speech, former CIA Director Robert Gates indicated it would be at least 5-10 years before the level of terrorism risk is economically insurable. Accordingly, we believe the message in all this new information is that the risk of massive losses from terrorism in the near future needs to be weighed in terms of its impact on property owners, lenders, insurers and their investors.

Investment conclusion. Our overall conclusion is that the stocks currently reflect the assumption that no terrorism insurance bill will pass, and no WTC-size loss will be repeated any time soon. Weighing the business and stock valuation impact of political behavior and terrorist attacks is tricky for the same reason we believe terrorism losses are uninsurable. It is practically impossible to assign a probability of recurrence to an unprecedented event of the magnitude of the September 11 attacks. One thing we now believe, however, is that such a massive attack is possible. In all our scenario analysis, we think a negative scenario — another attack occurring today without a terrorism bill in place — is the one investors need to think about most, because this is the one scenario we think is currently least priced into the market. Under this scenario, we believe:

- The property/casualty insurance companies (the first derivative in the financial sector chain of events) and their stocks would suffer the greatest blow, offset by further acceleration in insurance rate increases. We believe the primary insurers would likely take a significantly bigger hit than reinsurers, with the insurance brokers, as non-risk-bearing intermediaries, possibly gaining. Government intervention financially, however, would probably be swift and might reverse the valuation dynamics. The question is whether the government would restore capital as well as pay claims. We also do not think capital would rush into the industry as quickly as it did after 9/11, because the level of risk would be perceived as greater. The financial impact of a second event could be more severe than the impact of the WTC event for some companies, assuming a comparable amount of losses despite post-9/11 efforts to reduce exposures, because of the already weakened financial condition of certain insurer balance sheets.

- Real estate investment trusts (REITs), in addition to incurring the actual loss of property, could be hit by both lower liquidity and lower real estate values as well as by higher borrowing costs, higher security costs and higher insurance costs and reduced insurance availability for properties that most closely fit the profile of the terrorists' targets. Developers might find asset-backed financing harder to complete and be forced to move toward corporate debt issuance, which can be costlier.
- Lower down on the impact scale would be credit-sensitive financials, depending on whether another wave of attacks would negatively affect interest rates. We think interest rates could be vulnerable in the aftermath of another attack without a terrorism bill in place, depending on the size of the losses and the method the government would use to fund those losses under financial-crisis conditions. Offsetting this impact would be how the event could lead to stricter credit standards, higher loan interest rates and an acceleration of efforts to improve loan portfolios in terms of credit quality. Individual financial institutions that have excess concentrations in affected properties would suffer losses.
- Capital markets financials could be hurt by the impact on the collateralized mortgage backed securities market as well as any post-attack weakness in the equity markets akin to what happened after 9/11. At the same time, another attack might create the opportunity to generate innovative property financing alternatives created by the impacts on the real estate market and interest rates.

Who holds the risk? Our view is that the bulk of the financial risk in a terrorist attack resides with those who finance and own commercial real estate, the companies that occupy the space, and those who insure real estate and the businesses and lives of the people who occupy those spaces. This would include central business district real estate, regional shopping malls, and large hotels. This does not mean, however, that the risk is non-existent for suburban offices, small hotels and shopping centers — only that the risk may be lower in those locations.

We are aware, for example, that insurers are not excluding terrorism coverage on properties and businesses that do not seem like obvious terrorist targets — a motel on a sparsely populated highway. On the other hand, we think it is a mistake to assume that only major cities like New York and trophy real estate like the World Trade Center constitute the only potential targets. As a recent Swiss Re report pointed out, a terrorist destroyed a major federal office building in Oklahoma City — not an especially high-profile property in a medium-sized city.

Exhibit 3 gives an indication of how much value is tied up in US commercial property and how much property-related financing was outstanding at year-end 2000. This represents the total value at risk — to varying but essentially unknowable degrees — in a terrorist attack. This does not cover residential real estate, but once again, that does not mean we think residences are immune to terrorist actions. For example, terrorists are known to have worked on launching attacks involving nuclear, biological and chemical weapons. Many insurers and reinsurers are specifically excluding losses from these types of attacks, but fire losses following a nuclear attack are not excluded, and fire following any act of terrorism is not excludable in 29 states, including the major industrial states such as California and New York. Nor can workers' compensation losses or group life be excluded. Nuclear, chemical, and biological terrorism may not be excluded from personal insurance. Life and disability covers all risks.

Exhibit 4 shows the extent to which some of the sectors referred to in this report are exposed to commercial real estate in terms of equity and debt ownership. Not surprisingly, the commercial banking sector has the largest exposure to commercial real estate loans, while corporations have the largest exposure to real estate owned.

Insurance covers only a fraction of value. Perhaps the most striking reality is the relatively small amount of net premiums US property/casualty insurers collect — $19.8 billion in 2000 — for commercial multiperil coverage, which includes insuring the $5.5 trillion replacement value of all US commercial structures plus another $5.1 trillion in inventory, equipment and software. This also compares to total property/casualty industry capital ("surplus") of about $282 billion at year-end 2001, which is the entire US property/casualty industry's capacity to pay claims of all types (including personal coverages). We estimate the capital of the commercial lines industry, for all types of coverages including casualty, is about $125 billion. The

While insurance performs an extremely important economic function, by design it covers a finite amount of risk that is, in the aggregate, somewhat predictable over time. Events that fall outside this definition of insurability due to their potential size and lack of predictability are not insurable because the economic cost to set aside capital to cover such a risk is too high for the economy to bear. This is the point at which the government steps in, and this is what the debate over terrorism is all about.

Terror bill background. The September 11 terrorist attacks brought to light a new level of risk that clearly had not been previously contemplated. Nearly every kind of insurance coverage was triggered — including personal and commercial property (with business interruption), aviation liability, workers' compensation, personal and commercial auto, commercial property, liability and others, along with life insurance and accident & health. It involved an unprecedented concentration of property loss, economic losses and loss of life — more than 3,000 lives, four commercial airliners, hundreds of companies and thousands of their employees who survived but were affected in various ways.

Reinsurers immediately began to notify clients they would renew expiring contracts with exclusions for claims from future similar terrorist attack losses. At the same time, however, reinsurers as well as insurers quietly started looking for ways to write the coverage in limited ways and away from locations they deemed to be obvious terrorist targets — high-profile urban trophy properties, power plants, airports, and major events. Publicity focused on the immediate threat of property owners and developers and commercial enterprises facing potential default notices from lenders citing the lack of terrorism coverage.

Starting in October, Congressional aides began to write legislation to provide a government guarantee to cover such losses, without which it was assumed banks would be unwilling to make any commercial and industrial real estate loans. At that time, no one seemed to question the assumption that the inability to get terrorism coverage would lead to an economic crisis triggered by lenders calling in property loans with covenants requiring the coverage. The bill that emerged would authorize the Treasury Department to pay as much as $90 billion of losses above the first $10 billion that the insurance industry would cover.

By the end of the year, the bill had stumbled. The two parties split over a provision for tort reform, which President Bush had set as a requirement for his signature. The inability to compromise on this point killed the bill. Once it was clear there would be no bill by year-end, a reinsurance renewal logjam, caused by the wait-and-see over the terror bill, broke open.

Bill's current status. The urgency to pass a bill diminished after year-end, partly because no obvious evidence emerged of a brewing economic crisis. Bank regulators and industry trade associations indicated that lenders were not wholesale calling in loans or turning away borrowers over terror insurance exclusions. Examples of deals derailed by lack of terror-cover availability were the exception rather than the rule. However, as of this writing, the House Financial Services Committee was reconvening hearings on a bill, including testimony from the Government Accounting Office pointing to the need for a federal backstop. Still, we think that the farther away we get from September 11 without another catastrophic event, the harder it gets to push a bill through Congress. Meanwhile, insurers, developers and lenders keep finding ways to do business — essentially by increasing their exposures and costs — without a backstop.

Why a bill is still needed. We believe, however, that such a bill is as necessary as ever. Repeated terrorist attacks of the WTC magnitude are essentially uninsurable risks. It is practically impossible to estimate the probability of recurrence. Politically motivated intentional criminal acts resist actuarial analysis. The lack of a bill puts property and business owners in the position of having to pay much higher insurance rates — 50-100% and greater for central business district real estate — for less coverage and self-funding the balance of the exposure under pressure from lenders.

If and when a catastrophic event occurs, these owners will absorb a far greater share of the loss than they did on 9/11. As a result, some businesses could fail, unless they tied up much more capital in advance to cover the risk — capital that normally would be available to finance normal operations and growth. Without a terror bill, we think lenders will be imposing stricter requirements on an increasing portion of their loan portfolios as those portfolios mature. Insurers, meanwhile, are still over-exposed, because they can exclude only as much terrorism coverage as state governments allow (which is not a lot) and can buy very little reinsurance affordably to limit their exposure. In effect, all these businesses collectively are gambling on either dodging the next massive attack or having the government step in after the fact and efficiently provide the capital.

Most important to recognize is that the 9/11 attack was not a fluke, nor was it entirely unforeseen. It was a second attempt on the same property perpetrated by sophisticated, well-funded terrorists. Since 1968, more than 10,000 acts of terrorism have been recorded, including 14 events with more than 100 fatalities. In 1999, the Hart-Rudman Commission on National Security in the 21st Century concluded “Americans will die on American soil, possibly in large numbers” as a result of terrorism. The National Commission on Terrorism in June 2001 said the “#1 priority” of the US should be to address loose affiliations of transnational terrorists seeking to inflict large numbers of casualties.

Yet the economy continues to absorb such exposure. In the end, we think it would be better for the federal government to establish a structure for covering uninsurable losses from the next major attack than to do nothing. Any after-the-fact response would probably involve emergency funding that could have inequitable outcomes. Congress has been widely criticized for bailing out the airlines just 10 days after 9/11, then not acting on other parts of the economy. Such disparate outcomes are avoidable.

Real Estate Investment Trusts

The current lack of affordable terrorism insurance coverage for many types of real estate has already generated negative impacts for a variety of REITs. Significant uncertainty continues to surround the possibility of government intervention as well as the possibility of another terror attack. In order to help investors better navigate these uncertainties, we provide some initial conclusions about the prospects of the real estate industry (as well as various property sectors and REITs). (See Terrorism and Insurance

Financial Institutions – February 27, 2002

Risks: Assessing Sensitivities by Gregory Whyte, Matthew Ostrower and Robert Stevenson being published simultaneously with this report.).

Initial conclusions. The terrorist attacks of September 11 and the enormous and tragic loss of human life and property that accompanied them led to significant new uncertainties in the real estate sector, which was already beginning to feel the brunt of a national economic downturn. Among these uncertainties was how real estate owners would continue to obtain insurance coverage for their assets, particularly those with high rise (“skyline”) characteristics. This issue was exacerbated by: 1) the fact that most insurance policies (and the terrorism insurance that has traditionally been a part of them) expire on December 31 of each year, and 2) most secured loans (mortgages) would fall into technical default without some kind of ongoing terrorism insurance.

With no backstop legislation in place, the negative consequences of no terrorism coverage have begun to set in for real estate landlords, and, we believe, ultimately tenants as well. Certain real estate asset types and companies are clearly more affected than others are (Exhibit 7). However, we believe it is possible to draw some broad conclusions. We believe the current lack of terrorism legislation has, and will continue to have several negative effects:

- 1) Real estate borrowing will likely become more difficult and more expensive. We expect mortgage spreads to rise in response to increased insurance risk, the collateralized mortgage-backed securities (CMBS) market may continue to balk at single loans with trophy/skyline collateral, and REITs will likely increasingly resort more to the (generally) higher spread corporate market.
- 2) General insurance costs will likely continue to remain higher than pre-9/11 levels (we believe earthquake insurance is already up sharply, with meaningfully higher deductibles). We expect these costs to continue to rise, but to rise less dramatically if a terrorism insurance bill is eventually passed.
- 3) Building security costs will likely remain higher seen as vulnerable to attack: central business district (CBD) office buildings, certain regional malls, and assets located near sites perceived as risky.

Issue Sensitivity Spectrum

In the event terrorism insurance legislation is ultimately passed, we believe the short-term impacts will be lower insurance and debt costs, providing the most relief to those companies and asset types that were most adversely affected by the current lack of coverage. Given the negative impacts on the real estate industry in just the past 8-10 weeks, we now believe that a bill is more likely today than it would have appeared even four weeks ago. We believe even the passage of a bill and no new attack will still see the real estate industry worse off than pre-9/11, but it is still the best case scenario. In an effort to assess the degree of negative impact, we have outlined the consequences of each of four different scenarios on the industry below. We believe companies in the most sensitive sectors (e.g. BXP, BPO, EOP, VNO, RSE, and SPG) will be the biggest winners in positive scenarios (such as Scenario 1) and the biggest losers in the negative scenarios (Scenario 3). (Current prices: BXP $37, BPO $18, EOP $28, VNO $42, RSE $30, SPG $31.)

Scenario Analysis: Real Estate and REITs

Scenario 1: A bill is in place, no attack occurs. As it pertains to the real estate industry, and with particular focus on the landlord (often time the public landlords are REITs), we believe:

- After rising to exorbitant rates post 9/11 (and becoming unavailable in many circumstances) market rates on new terrorism insurance policies begin to fall. Terrorism insurance again becomes widely available.
- The passage of a bill would eventually see the return of liquidity to mortgage and single asset CMBS markets, particularly those involving higher profile “trophy” assets (e.g. skyline CBD assets).
- Although some asset classes allow for occupancy costs to be billed back to tenants (e.g. commercial and retail), we believe higher insurance costs are effectively shared by landlords and tenants regardless of property type. For this reason, the somewhat lower costs that would likely accompany a terrorism bill would benefit both landlords and tenants.

Potential winners/losers. We believe valuations of companies in the most sensitive sectors already reflect some of the negatives associated with the current lack of easily available terrorism insurance (though they do not appear to reflect any major discount as a result of potential exposure to another terrorist event). The passage of a terror bill would lead to more extensive insurance coverage, and potentially lower insurance and borrowing costs for companies such as BXP, BPO, EOP, VNO, RSE, SPG, etc. Less sensitive companies/sectors that are currently experiencing fewer impacts would benefit, but to a lesser extent.

Scenario 2: No bill is passed, no attack occurs. The absence of any passage of a terrorism bill, even without an additional terror attack, is clearly a negative for the REIT sector. We believe this scenario would lead to:

- A sharp rise in operating expenses to cover extremely high insurance and security costs. Landlords begin to question the ability of insurers to meet future terror claims.
- Some landlords may choose to forego expensive terrorism insurance, which would have ramifications on borrowing conditions:
 - 1) Borrowers may fall into technical default on secured loans, which could precipitate some adjustment to both terms and rate.
 - 2) Rating agencies might respond with cuts to credit ratings, making alternative, non-secured borrowing more costly and less accessible.
 - 3) Construction financing and takeout financing become landlord headaches.
- CMBS liquidity becomes more limited and may even dry up, particularly for those real estate assets perceived as more vulnerable. Initiating new single skyline asset CMBS transactions becomes impossible; rates on multi asset CMBS deals also go up, reflecting higher risks.
- Reduced liquidity in the real estate market negatively impacts real estate valuations, particularly for those assets typically financed with secured debt.
- Banks likely eventually begin originating secured loans, but increasingly seek cross-collateralization or recourse when high profile assets are involved.
- Rental rates slow further than they already have as tenants respond to rising occupancy costs.

- For the tenants, occupancy costs may rise up to or even exceed expense stops. Most affected assets will likely be office/high-rise, or other perceived-to-be-vulnerable properties (e.g. regional malls).

Potential winners/losers. The lack of a terrorism insurance bill (despite the lack of terror attack) would serve to raise operating and borrowing costs as well as cause the most exposed companies to take on more risk by self-insuring. We believe that the values of stocks in the most sensitive sectors only partially reflect these negatives, and could therefore face more multiple contraction if it becomes clear that no affordable terrorism insurance will become available. As in Scenario 1, the less sensitive sectors will also be negatively affected, but to a lesser extent.

Scenario 3: No bill is in place, an attack occurs. This represents the worst scenario for real estate owners. In assessing the impact on the industry (and on REITs specifically), we believe it is necessary to examine the initial and longer term impacts:

- Initial impacts:
 - 1) There will be a sharp rise in operating costs due to much higher insurance costs (expect tenants to experience higher occupancy costs up to the entire expense stop limitation).
 - 2) The CMBS market (both single- and multi-asset transactions) likely freezes for all asset types, but particularly for the skyline assets and the asset class targeted in the attack.
 - 3) Landlords assess the value of continuing with terrorism insurance coverage given the potential inability of insurers to meet future claims.
 - 4) Secured borrowing rates spike, limiting liquidity in this market.
 - 5) Non-secured corporate borrowing for REITs is the only remaining alternative, but higher perceived risk drive rates up sharply after rating agencies focus on ratings.
 - 6) Real estate values fall sharply due to limited insurability and dramatic drop in real estate debt liquidity.
- Longer-term impacts:
 - 1) Congress ultimately establishes some sort of federal backstop or “Pool Re” program.
 - 2) This will likely result in the return of some normalcy in the real estate markets, with values appreciating, but operating costs still higher than pre-9/11 levels.

Thought this was pretty good, in case you haven't seen.

Marc, I think we need to have another call on this. I'd like to bring everyone up to date on our conversations with Schumer's office.

Also, what would the group think about my setting up a meeting with Bob Hunter of CFA to talk with him and try to share perspectives? His skepticism on this issue is hurting us with some of the key players on the Dem side. I think it would be helpful to have White House representation at such a meeting.

Let me know.

Assessing Terror and Related Legislative Risks

- Earnings and valuation risks are real
We assess potential impact on real estate, banking, brokerage and nonlife insurance sectors of another 9/11-size attack and the government response.
- Current valuations don't seem to reflect attack risk
In all these sectors, we think current valuations do not reflect impact of another attack without a terrorism bill in place.
- Insurance stocks most vulnerable to attacks with no bill
Insurers, lacking data, may be allowing exposures to expand with insufficient safeguards; reinsurers are managing exposures better.
- REITs are caught in the middle
Lenders and insurers can impose higher rates, and REITs and landlords can pass along only some of the increased costs.
- Capital markets-focused firms seem least exposed
Fallout on borrowers could ripple through mortgage-backed market; however, investment banks could come up with innovative products as alternatives.

Potential winners/losers. We believe all REITs would experience significant negative short-term valuation impacts if a terror attack were to occur in the absence of any terrorism insurance legislation. Investor fears about further equity losses in the event of future attacks, potentially unavailable terrorism insurance, higher borrowing spreads and the limited availability of debt capital would cause significant multiple contraction. This phenomenon would likely occur most for the most sensitive property sectors. These negative effects would likely be greatly mitigated if the federal government were to quickly enact a terrorism insurance backstop/bailout following the second attack.

Scenario 4: A bill is passed, an attack occurs. Despite the passage of a terrorism bill, whereby there is a federally funded backstop, we believe overall costs of obtaining insurance after an attack will likely rise — particularly for the affected asset type(s). From the landlord's perspective, we believe the impact from this scenario includes:

- Higher property operating expenses
- Higher borrowing costs on debt renewal, as the asset class is seen to be riskier, both in the CMBS and corporate borrowing arena
- Security costs rise again.
- The secured lending market would probably become even more focused on adequate insurance coverage for loan collateral.

Potential winners/losers. The passage of a terrorism insurance bill (and the more extensive, affordable terrorism insurance and debt capital) likely would not prevent some negative valuation impact if another terror attack were to occur. In this case, we believe REITs with skyline and high profile assets would clearly be most impacted, while their lower profile peers would likely be spared. It is worth mentioning, however, that the more sensitive companies would likely be deemed winners in between the passage of the insurance bill and the actual attack.

Banks, Brokers and Asset Managers

Initial Conclusions. We think that investors may be too focused on credit issues (Enron, K-Mart and now Global Crossing) and off-balance sheet disclosures to think about the implications of the passage / non-passage of the terrorism bill. We do not fault them, but we do believe that the outcome of the terrorism bill legislation could have a significant impact on banking and brokerage stocks. A key issue, as we see it, is whether lenders will continue to lend to what are perceived to be high-risk properties if the real estate companies cannot secure adequate insurance protection. Also, if the commercial mortgage-backed market does slow, what does this mean for trading profits for the BIG fixed income players in this area?

In evaluating the possible impact on the stocks in our universe based on the four scenarios, our primary conclusion is that in all scenarios, capital markets based firms seem to fare slightly better than the credit sensitive firms (except if a major terrorist attack does irrevocable damage to the securities industry's infrastructure).

On the other hand, we do think that traditional lending companies face marginal risks if the bill is not passed and another attack occurs. Under this scenario, more properties would be damaged potentially limiting the repayment of those loans to some banks and the insurance industry may become increasingly fragile limiting the effectiveness of current insurance policies. Longer term, credit spreads against commercial real estate would also likely rise, although the positive impact to the income statement would be offset by a slower pace of real estate activity.

According to Betsy Daniels, who is working on picking up the regional banks, banks are thinking through how they want to approach lending in a world without terrorism coverage on property. There is no "one-size-fits-all" approach. The banks can take several paths, ranging from renewing the loan, changing the terms on the loan, asking the borrower to get a terrorism rider, asking the borrower to self-insure for terrorism, or pulling the loan. Banks are choosing what makes sense for them given their business mix and risk appetite and decisions are likely to be made on a loan-by-loan basis. The key point is that the banks are thinking about these issues and are trying to create a game-plan to limit their exposure to further terrorist property destruction.

These issues are more likely to impact the traditional lending companies than the capital markets companies. Construction and commercial real estate loans were 19.5% of total average loans at US commercial banks as of September 30, 2001. At JPM and Citigroup, though, these loans represent just a fraction of overall business. Indeed, based on our analysis, we think that around 0.99% of Citi's total loans are related to domestic real estate, while we believe that 2.27% of JPM's total loans are related to domestic real estate (at the end of 3Q01, latest available data). At the moment, we retain our Neutral rating on JPM and maintain our Outperform on Citigroup.

Within the brokerage sector, we think that Lehman Brothers (LEH, $56, Outperform-V, target $73) and Goldman Sachs (GS, $81, Outperform-V, target $92) are most levered to the commercial mortgage back industry (which would obviously slow if real estate companies were not able to obtain financing at will), ranking second and fourth, respectively, in U.S. public and Rule 144A CMBS (collateralized mortgage backed securities) offerings. However, Goldman is traditionally not a major player in this market (i.e., the company had some big trades at the end of the 2001 that boosted it in the rankings). Separately, Credit Suisse First Boston (a unit of Credit Suisse), ranked first in this CMBS market in 2001. All told, according to Thomson Financial Securities Data, $63.0 billion of CMBS were offered in 2001 (Exhibit 8).

Interest rate impact. Looking at the big picture, we also are intrigued by the possible impact of the passage of the terrorism bill on the treasury market. If the terrorism bill is passed, the Federal Government becomes the reinsurer of terrorism related risks. Would government bondholders demand a terrorism risk free premium? If yes, then would the long-term benchmark risk free rate rise significantly? An increase in the benchmark rate would increase lending costs for all borrowers, which could be a negative for companies with high leverage ratios. Also, if real estate companies (REITS) were not able to secure mortgage financing and had to use the capital markets via straight debt issuance, we actually think that this opportunity could be an interesting one for the capital markets that we cover, particularly firms with a strong presence in the investment grade market.

Scenario Analysis: Banks and Brokers

Scenario 1: A bill is in place, no attack occurs. We believe that the passage of the bill with no incidence of further terrorist attacks in the near future would be a marginal positive for the credit sensitive names like C and JPM. Key to our thinking is government protection would allow lenders to still allocate capital to real estate companies with little residual impact from “event risks” like the tragic events of September 11, 2001. Separately, we believe that this scenario would entail healthier economic growth and stronger equity markets (due to the absence of any external shocks) — a significant positive for the broker/dealers and equity focused asset managers in our universe. In addition, the factors favoring economic growth (lower costs of doing business — specifically, insurance and security costs) would also positively impact the expense lines for all the stocks we cover. However, we do expect a marginal increase in documentation costs for banks as lending agreements incorporate various terrorism related clauses, and a marginal increase in insurance rates for policyholders.

Financial Institutions – February 27, 2002

Potential winners/losers. We think that this scenario would be a marginal positive for all the stocks in our group for the reasons highlighted above. As such, under this scenario, we do feel comfortable reiterating our investment thesis: From a macro perspective, we continue to believe that capital markets firms outpace credit sensitive and fee-based companies. In diversified financials we continue to favor Citigroup (C, $44, Outperform, target $59) over JPMorgan Chase (JPM, $29, Neutral). In the small cap asset management arena, we remain bullish across the board: Affiliated Managers (AMG, $67, Outperform, target $73), BlackRock (BLK, $44, Outperform, target $48), Waddell & Reed (WDR, $30, Outperform, target $35), and Federated Investors (FIL, $31, Strong Buy, target $35). Finally, we have a mixed bag on the Arms Dealers. Specifically, we like companies like Investment Technology Group (ITG, $45, Outperform, target $46) (play on cost, speed, globalization, and value-added), while we remain cautious on other names, including Instinet (INET, $7, not rated).

Scenario 2: No bill is passed, no attack occurs. Our second scenario would essentially entail continuation of the status quo (we don't have a terrorism bill and fortunately there have been no more terrorist attacks). As we think that investors in our stocks have not yet focused on these issues, we do not expect any major impact on stock prices. However, we expect companies to spend more on security especially since terrorism related insurance coverage would be more difficult to secure.

Lenders continue to expect insurance against terrorist acts on the credits they extend — either through insurance policy coverage or through borrower self-insurance. Some lenders may look to cash in some of their “bad chips” by charging higher rates or refusing to extend funds to some credits on the grounds that they are not willing to underwrite loans that do not have terrorism related coverage. We believe that lenders may selectively take this approach towards certain credits. We do not expect widespread application, as it would result in the lender self-selecting out of the real estate lending market. Targeted pruning could marginally improve asset quality at some lenders.

Another related development would be a slowdown in some sectors of the CMBS market — especially for securities backed by high profile assets like tall office buildings and big regional malls. As a result we expect real estate firms to borrow funds at the corporate level rather than accessing capital markets through asset backed securities leading to a 20 to 30 basis point increase in their cost of funds. We think that investment banks will look upon this development as an opportunity and would come up with innovative financial products to solve the financing needs of real estate firms.

Scenario 3: No bill is in place, an attack occurs. Our third scenario, which is also our worst case scenario, evaluates the impact of a major terrorist attack in case the terrorism bill has not been passed. As in scenario 4, the development could be a significant negative for firms like GS, MER ($47), and LEH if it leads to another disruption in the nation's capital markets. For the credit sensitive names, we expect major credit losses as a direct result of the attack as most exposures would not be backed by insurance. In addition, the shock to the economy could lead to a deterioration in the overall credit situation, driving both provisions and credit costs materially higher. The shock to the equity markets could also depress earnings at capital markets based firms and equity focused asset managers. The occurrence of another attack would also lead to increased security expenses by businesses.

Potential winners/losers. We believe that credit sensitive names will come under the most pressure under such a scenario. Although we believe that the federal government would intervene to prevent a breakdown of the financial system, we believe that credit sensitive names could experience a “double whammy”. Specifically, in addition to the direct credit losses they would experience as a result of the attack, the external shock to the nation's economy would increase credit costs going forward (even if the companies had no exposure to the areas/ businesses directly impacted by the attack). We would expect capital markets

Scenario 4: A bill is passed, an attack occurs. Irrespective of whether a terrorism bill has been passed, we believe that the initial reaction of the market will be negative for most of the stocks in our coverage universe. The development could be a significant negative for capital markets based firms if it leads to another disruption in the nation's capital markets.

However we do not expect any major credit losses at the credit sensitive firms as a direct result of the attack as most exposures would be backed by insurance. That said the shock to the economy could lead to a deterioration in the overall credit situation, leading to higher credit costs at the firms we cover. In addition, the shock to the equity markets could depress earnings at capital markets based firms and equity focused asset managers. The occurrence of another attack would also lead to higher insurance rates for policyholders and increased security expenses by businesses.

Potential winners/losers. If the attack does not lead to a disruption in the nation's capital markets and equity markets rebound soon after the attack, we believe that capital markets firms will outperform credit sensitive and fee-based companies (as happened after 9/11). We also expect capital markets firms to outperform other financials, as the rebuilding effort would require a significant amount of capital to be raised. We think that the attack could amount to another external shock to the nation's economy, leading to a deterioration in credit that could raise credit costs at Citigroup and JPMorgan Chase. Within the credit sensitive names, we would expect firms with better credit management practices to significantly outperform their peers because of two reasons: 1) they would have pruned their uninsured terrorism risk exposure, and 2) they would also have lower credit costs if the economy were to head into a recession.

The Property/Casualty Sector

As noted in the February 22, 2002, issue of P/C Insurance & Risk Briefing, we believe the equity markets generally do not appear to be discounting in insurers' material risk from terrorism in the absence of a terrorism bill. Nevertheless, we believe many primary commercial lines insurers (and, to Financial Institutions – February 27, 2002 a lesser extent, personal lines insurers) retain considerable residual terrorism risk. Therefore, we believe that investors need to reconcile their willingness to accept terrorism risk, other offsetting factors they may find attractive in a stock, and their return requirement.

Initial conclusions. We believe that most primary insurers and some reinsurers cannot adequately measure their exposure aggregations from a hypothetical event. They are only just beginning to gather exposure information, such as employee locations for workers' compensation. Meantime, virtually all primary insurers talk about limiting exposure as much as they can, but they do not provide enough information to determine how a particular insurer would fare under a worst-case scenario. They do not, for example, provide a probable maximum loss estimate (PML) as they ordinarily do with other types of catastrophic risks. Nor are we aware of any insurer taking an across-the-board approach of simply non-renewing policies without terrorism losses excluded.

Insurers imposing exclusions using nonadmitted policy forms are assuming that the ban on exclusions in some states is trumped by their nonadmittance status. There is a slight risk, however, that policyholders and regulators might challenge that interpretation in an effort to broaden available coverage after the fact. We also believe insurers are assuming they can invoke the war exclusion in another attack; however, we assume that issue would ultimately be litigated. Additionally, we believe that the primary exclusions that have been approved may be insufficient to prevent insurer insolvency, especially for insurers that write workers' compensation, group life, and significant amounts of property insurance (Exhibits 9 and 10).

In short, we think investors cannot assess the risk of terrorism in a portfolio of insurance stocks any better than an insurer can assess the terrorism risk in its insurance portfolio. However, investors can control their exposure to risk, by limiting the amount they invest in such stocks to an amount within their risk tolerance from such an event. Accordingly, we are not averse to investing in terrorism-exposed insurance stocks, but we believe investors should not over-concentrate in these stocks. We also believe that investors should require a higher return in exchange for this additional, and unquantifiable, risk. Comparisons to historical valuations should take note of this higher level of risk. We would consider stocks with the same valuation as pre-9/11 as now more "expensive."

This approach to investing is similar to one we would follow for cat-exposed insurers that do not buy earthquake or hurricane reinsurance, although with added uncertainties:

1) we do not know as much about the level of risk for individual insurers as we normally do for other types of catastrophic risks; 2) we know nothing about the overall frequency and severity of terrorism risk.

Scenario Analysis: Property/Casualty Insurers

Scenario 1: A bill is in place, no attack occurs. This is the second-best scenario for short-term earnings and the best case for valuation. Reinsurers and property insurers would have greater certainty about their exposures and could price accordingly.

While rates might not rise as sharply as without a bill, the existence of a federal backstop would remove a large balance sheet vulnerability. Under this scenario, we assume no WTC-size event occurs this year, presumably giving insurers that much time to rebuild surplus — including additional capital-raising. Brokers' earnings upside from commissions and fees might be slightly muted, taking their portion of rates that might not be as sharply higher as they would be without a terror bill. Valuations could probably be higher with a terror bill in place because of the perception of reduced shock-loss risk and volatility. However, since we believe the market is not discounting terrorism risk, the impact could be limited.

Potential Winners/Losers. Our current market-weight position on the brokers would stand. For the commercial primary insurers, this could be a positive, removing the uncertainty. Our position on the reinsurers would also shift toward the positive.

Scenario 2: No bill is passed, no attack occurs. This is the best-case scenario from an earnings perspective in the short term and the second-best scenario from a valuation perspective. It is also the current scenario, and our current market-weight position on the commercial insurance industry reflects this status quo. In our view, this is a positive for reinsurers and brokers and for property insurers on non-customized coverages. Insurers and reinsurers are charging steeper rates for more restricted coverage of an unpredictable risk that under this scenario does not recur this year.

Potential winners/losers. We think that only the most disciplined commercial insurers and reinsurers with the strongest balance sheets, best ratings and compelling valuations are desirable amid the protracted uncertainty of no federal backstop and no guarantees that terrorists will never again strike with the ferocity of 9/11. We are skeptical that exclusions will remain as firm as they are currently.

Scenario 3: No bill is in place, an attack occurs. Rates likely would soar, we believe, along with demand, but capacity would likely shrink as losses mounted. Earnings, in our view, would be depressed for many large commercial insurers and reinsurers, and net investment income would come under pressure from the likely impact on capital markets in the wake of another attack. The government might step in with some form of emergency funding, with an uncertain and possibly inequitable impact. The capital markets might be reluctant after the second major attack to commit another round of funding. In a second attack, some of the stronger players, in our view, could have impaired balance sheets and have difficulty maintaining their financial strength and credit ratings. A capacity crisis could develop. The post-9/11 measures taken to limit exposures would probably have a minimal effect, because we think those measures would not have had a chance to permeate insurers entire books. The following legal questions could quickly arise under this scenario:

- Was the attack an act of war, and excludable?
- Might states try to force policies written on an excess & surplus lines basis to cover terrorism after the fact?
- Would anyone bear liability exposure?
- Would Congress be more inclined to grant liability relief from terrorism-related events?
- Would foreign insurers and reinsurers doing business in the US follow US laws and practices?

Potential winners/losers. We would expect reinsurance and insurance broker stocks to gain under this scenario and primary insurer stocks to lose. We think reinsurers, which are not subject to state regulation on terrorism coverage exclusions, have generally been reducing their exposures to terror risk faster than primary writers and writing new contracts that offer more limited coverages at high rates. Brokers, again as the intermediaries, would benefit from what we think would be another surge in rates, as well as demand. Primary insurers, in our view, would be much more vulnerable, having achieved limited success in excluding terrorist losses and in finding affordable, effective reinsurance.

Scenario 4: A bill is passed, an attack occurs. This could actually be one of the better scenarios for earnings, again depending on the shape of the bill passed, and third best for valuation. We view this scenario as a net positive. Underwriters would know exactly where their exposures begin and end, and could price and set deductibles, limits and exclusions more accurately. Yet the private market would still bear the insurable portion of the risk.

Potential winners/losers. We assume the impact on insurers and reinsurers would be far more predictable than without a bill—analogous to any other catastrophe (i.e., positive).

V = More volatile. We estimate that this stock has more than a 25% chance of a price move (up or down) of more than 25% in a month, based on a quantitative assessment of historical data, or in the analyst's view, it is likely to become materially more volatile over the next 1-12 months compared with the past three years. Stocks with less than one year of trading history are automatically rated as more volatile (unless otherwise noted). We note that securities that we do not currently consider "volatile" can still perform in that manner.

Assessing Terror and Related Legislative Risks

Summary

September 11 changed the world's perception of risk. Insurers and reinsurers were the first to react, moving to exclude losses from future terrorist attacks in policy language. Congress immediately began work on a bill to provide the coverage but failed to pass legislation before year-end. The issue is back before Congress but passage of a bill is uncertain. Whether another terrorist attack occurs with or without a bill in place has significant implications for the banking, brokerage, asset management, real estate and insurance industries' earnings and valuations.

Morgan Stanley's analysts who cover these sectors have produced this report to weigh the likely impact on these sectors of a federal terrorism insurance bill passing or not, depending on whether another World Trade Center-size attack occurs in the US. (For discussion purposes, we are ignoring the worst-case scenario of a major nuclear, chemical or bio-terrorism attack because of the enormous, unpredictable consequences on the economy and society. Only the government can address this risk, in our view.) We assume that if a bill were to pass, it would resemble some compromise between the current House bill and last year's failed Senate version (under which the federal government would pay as much as $90 billion of terror attack losses over a three-year period, with insurers paying the first $10 billion of losses). Our aim is to identify the degree to which stocks are discounting in terrorism and the winners and losers under the four possible scenarios (Exhibit 1):

Exhibit 1

without action from the Senate). No follow-up massive attack has occurred although some seem to have been averted (and investors — and even some businesses — seem to be assuming that none will occur any time soon). The government has indicated that terrorism remains a very real risk, and our aim is to provide investors with a framework for thinking about the implications of the four possible scenarios, without necessarily assigning probabilities to whether a bill will pass or another massive attack occurs.

The 9/11 event by itself showed that the terrorists are much more coordinated, capable and determined than was generally thought prior to the event. Since then, the government's stepped-up efforts to gather intelligence has turned up new evidence that the terrorists are determined to plan and execute additional attacks. Preventive efforts also have been ramped up and appear to have thwarted some attacks. The risk of terrorism should be reduced over time; however, in a recent speech, former CIA Director Robert Gates indicated it would be at least 5-10 years before the level of terrorism risk is economically insurable. Accordingly, we believe the message in all this new information is that the risk of massive losses from terrorism in the near future needs to be weighed in terms of its impact on property owners, lenders, insurers and their investors.

Investment conclusion. Our overall conclusion is that the stocks currently reflect the assumption that no terrorism insurance bill will pass, and no WTC-size loss will be repeated any time soon. Weighing the business and stock valuation impact of political behavior and terrorist attacks is tricky for the same reason we believe terrorism losses are uninsurable. It is practically impossible to assign a probability of recurrence to an unprecedented event of the magnitude of the September 11 attacks. One thing we now believe, however, is that such a massive attack is possible. In all our scenario analysis, we think a negative scenario — another attack occurring today without a terrorism bill in place — is the one investors need to think about most, because this is the one scenario we think is currently least priced into the market. Under this scenario, we believe: believe the primary insurers would likely take a significantly bigger hit than reinsurers, with the insurance brokers, as non-risk-bearing intermediaries, possibly gaining. Government intervention financially, however, would probably be swift and might reverse the valuation dynamics. The question is whether the government would restore capital as well as pay claims. We also do not think capital would rush into the industry as quickly as it did after 9/11, because the level of risk would be perceived as greater. The financial impact of a second event could be more severe than the impact of the WTC event for some companies, assuming a comparable amount of losses despite post-9/11 efforts to reduce exposures, because of the already weakened financial condition of certain insurer balance sheets.

- Real estate investment trusts (REITs), in addition to incurring the actual loss of property, could be hit by both lower liquidity and lower real estate values as well as by higher borrowing costs, higher security costs and higher insurance costs and reduced insurance availability for properties that most closely fit the profile of the terrorists' targets. Developers might find asset-backed financing harder to complete and be forced to move toward corporate debt issuance, which can be costlier.
- Lower down on the impact scale would be credit-sensitive financials, depending on whether another wave of attacks would negatively affect interest rates. We think interest rates could be vulnerable in the aftermath of another attack without a terrorism bill in place, depending on the size of the losses and the method the government would use to fund those losses under financial-crisis conditions. Offsetting this impact would be how the event could lead to stricter credit standards, higher loan interest rates and an acceleration of efforts to improve loan portfolios in terms of credit quality. Individual financial institutions that have excess concentrations in affected properties would suffer losses.
- Capital markets financials could be hurt by the impact on the collateralized mortgage backed securities market as well as any post-attack weakness in the equity markets akin to what happened after 9/11. At the same time, another attack might create the opportunity to generate innovative property financing alternatives created by the impacts on the real estate market and interest rates.

Who holds the risk? Our view is that the bulk of the financial risk in a terrorist attack resides with those who finance and own commercial real estate, the companies that occupy the space, and those who insure real estate and the businesses and lives of the people who occupy those spaces. This would include central business district real estate, regional shopping malls, and large hotels. This does not mean, however, that the risk is non-existent for suburban offices, small hotels and shopping centers — only that the risk may be lower in those locations.

We are aware, for example, that insurers are not excluding terrorism coverage on properties and businesses that do not seem like obvious terrorist targets — a motel on a sparsely populated highway. On the other hand, we think it is a mistake to assume that only major cities like New York and trophy real estate like the World Trade Center constitute the only potential targets. As a recent Swiss Re report pointed out, a terrorist destroyed a major federal office building in Oklahoma City — not an especially high-profile property in a medium-sized city.

Exhibit 3 gives an indication of how much value is tied up in US commercial property and how much property-related financing was outstanding at year-end 2000. This represents the total value at risk — to varying but essentially unknowable degrees — in a terrorist attack. This does not cover residential real estate, but once again, that does not mean we think residences are immune to terrorist actions. For example, terrorists are known to have worked on launching attacks involving nuclear, biological and chemical weapons. Many insurers and reinsurers are specifically excluding losses from these types of attacks, but fire losses following a nuclear attack are not excluded, and fire following any act of terrorism is not excludable in 29 states, including the major industrial states such as California and New York. Nor can workers' compensation losses or group life be excluded. Nuclear, chemical, and biological terrorism may not be excluded from personal insurance. Life and disability covers all risks.

Exhibit 4 shows the extent to which some of the sectors referred to in this report are exposed to commercial real estate in terms of equity and debt ownership. Not surprisingly, the commercial banking sector has the largest exposure to commercial real estate loans, while corporations have the largest exposure to real estate owned.

Insurance covers only a fraction of value. Perhaps the most striking reality is the relatively small amount of net premiums US property/casualty insurers collect — $19.8 billion in 2000 — for commercial multiperil coverage, which includes insuring the $5.5 trillion replacement value of all US commercial structures plus another $5.1 trillion in inventory, equipment and software. This also compares to total property/casualty industry capital ("surplus") of about $282 billion at year-end 2001, which is the entire US property/casualty industry's capacity to pay claims of all types (including personal coverages). We estimate the capital of the commercial lines industry, for all types of coverages including casualty, is about $125 billion. The premiums collected for commercial multiperil are 13.4% of all commercial lines premiums. To put these numbers in context, for covering every dollar of commercial-structure replacement value and contents, property insurers collect about two tenths of a penny of premium and maintain surplus of approximately the same amount.

While insurance performs an extremely important economic function, by design it covers a finite amount of risk that is, in the aggregate, somewhat predictable over time. Events that fall outside this definition of insurability due to their potential size and lack of predictability are not insurable because the economic cost to set aside capital to cover such a risk is too high for the economy to bear. This is the point at which the government steps in, and this is what the debate over terrorism is all about.

Terror bill background. The September 11 terrorist attacks brought to light a new level of risk that clearly had not been previously contemplated. Nearly every kind of insurance coverage was triggered — including personal and commercial property (with business interruption), aviation liability, workers' compensation, personal and commercial auto, commercial property, liability and others, along with life insurance and accident & health. It involved an unprecedented concentration of property loss, economic losses and loss of life — more than 3,000 lives, four commercial airliners, hundreds of companies and thousands of their employees who survived but were affected in various ways.

Reinsurers immediately began to notify clients they would renew expiring contracts with exclusions for claims from future similar terrorist attack losses. At the same time, however, reinsurers as well as insurers quietly started looking for ways to write the coverage in limited ways and away from locations they deemed to be obvious terrorist targets — high-profile urban trophy properties, power plants, airports, and major events. Publicity focused on the immediate threat of property owners and developers and commercial enterprises facing potential default notices from lenders citing the lack of terrorism coverage.

Starting in October, Congressional aides began to write legislation to provide a government guarantee to cover such losses, without which it was assumed banks would be unwilling to make any commercial and industrial real estate loans. At that time, no one seemed to question the assumption that the inability to get terrorism coverage would lead to an economic crisis triggered by lenders calling in property loans with covenants requiring the coverage. The bill that emerged would authorize the Treasury Department to pay as much as $90 billion of losses above the first $10 billion that the insurance industry would cover.

By the end of the year, the bill had stumbled. The two parties split over a provision for tort reform, which President Bush had set as a requirement for his signature. The inability to compromise on this point killed the bill. Once it was clear there would be no bill by year-end, a reinsurance renewal logjam, caused by the wait-and-see over the terror bill, broke open.

Bill's current status. The urgency to pass a bill diminished after year-end, partly because no obvious evidence emerged of a brewing economic crisis. Bank regulators and industry trade associations indicated that lenders were not wholesale calling in loans or turning away borrowers over terror insurance exclusions. Examples of deals derailed by lack of terror-cover availability were the exception rather than the rule. However, as of this writing, the House Financial Services Committee was reconvening hearings on a bill, including testimony from the Government Accounting Office pointing to the need for a federal backstop. Still, we think that the farther away we get from September 11 without another catastrophic event, the harder it gets to push a bill through Congress. Meanwhile, insurers, developers and lenders keep finding ways to do business — essentially by increasing their exposures and costs — without a backstop.

Why a bill is still needed. We believe, however, that such a bill is as necessary as ever. Repeated terrorist attacks of the WTC magnitude are essentially uninsurable risks. It is practically impossible to estimate the probability of recurrence. Politically motivated intentional criminal acts resist actuarial analysis. The lack of a bill puts property and business owners in the position of having to pay much higher insurance rates — 50-100% and greater for central business district real estate — for less coverage and self-funding the balance of the exposure under pressure from lenders.

If and when a catastrophic event occurs, these owners will absorb a far greater share of the loss than they did on 9/11. As a result, some businesses could fail, unless they tied up much more capital in advance to cover the risk — capital that normally would be available to finance normal operations and growth. Without a terror bill, we think lenders will be imposing stricter requirements on an increasing portion of their loan portfolios as those portfolios mature. Insurers, meanwhile, are still over-exposed, because they can exclude only as much terrorism coverage as state governments allow (which is not a lot) and can buy very little reinsurance affordably to limit their exposure. In effect, all these businesses collectively are gambling on either dodging the next massive attack or having the government step in after the fact and efficiently provide the capital.

Most important to recognize is that the 9/11 attack was not a fluke, nor was it entirely unforeseen. It was a second attempt on the same property perpetrated by sophisticated, well-funded terrorists. Since 1968, more than 10,000 acts of terrorism have been recorded, including 14 events with more than 100 fatalities. In 1999, the Hart-Rudman Commission on National Security in the 21st Century concluded “Americans will die on American soil, possibly in large numbers” as a result of terrorism. The National Commission on Terrorism in June 2001 said the “#1 priority” of the US should be to address loose affiliations of transnational terrorists seeking to inflict large numbers of casualties.

Yet the economy continues to absorb such exposure. In the end, we think it would be better for the federal government to establish a structure for covering uninsurable losses from the next major attack than to do nothing. Any after-the-fact response would probably involve emergency funding that could have inequitable outcomes. Congress has been widely criticized for bailing out the airlines just 10 days after 9/11, then not acting on other parts of the economy. Such disparate outcomes are avoidable.

Real Estate Investment Trusts

The current lack of affordable terrorism insurance coverage for many types of real estate has already generated negative impacts for a variety of REITs. Significant uncertainty continues to surround the possibility of government intervention as well as the possibility of another terror attack. In order to help investors better navigate these uncertainties, we provide some initial conclusions about the prospects of the real estate industry (as well as various property sectors and REITs). (See Terrorism and Insurance

Financial Institutions – February 27, 2002

Risks: Assessing Sensitivities by Gregory Whyte, Matthew Ostrower and Robert Stevenson being published simultaneously with this report.).

Initial conclusions. The terrorist attacks of September 11 and the enormous and tragic loss of human life and property that accompanied them led to significant new uncertainties in the real estate sector, which was already beginning to feel the brunt of a national economic downturn. Among these uncertainties was how real estate owners would continue to obtain insurance coverage for their assets, particularly those with high rise (“skyline”) characteristics. This issue was exacerbated by: 1) the fact that most insurance policies (and the terrorism insurance that has traditionally been a part of them) expire on December 31 of each year, and 2) most secured loans (mortgages) would fall into technical default without some kind of ongoing terrorism insurance.

With no backstop legislation in place, the negative consequences of no terrorism coverage have begun to set in for real estate landlords, and, we believe, ultimately tenants as well. Certain real estate asset types and companies are clearly more affected than others are (Exhibit 7). However, we believe it is possible to draw some broad conclusions. We believe the current lack of terrorism legislation has, and will continue to have several negative effects:

- 1) Real estate borrowing will likely become more difficult and more expensive. We expect mortgage spreads to rise in response to increased insurance risk, the collateralized mortgage-backed securities (CMBS) market may continue to balk at single loans with trophy/skyline collateral, and REITs will likely increasingly resort more to the (generally) higher spread corporate market.
- 2) General insurance costs will likely continue to remain higher than pre-9/11 levels (we believe earthquake insurance is already up sharply, with meaningfully higher deductibles). We expect these costs to continue to rise, but to rise less dramatically if a terrorism insurance bill is eventually passed.
- 3) Building security costs will likely remain higher

seen as vulnerable to attack: central business district (CBD) office buildings, certain regional malls, and assets located near sites perceived as risky.

Issue Sensitivity Spectrum

In the event terrorism insurance legislation is ultimately passed, we believe the short-term impacts will be lower insurance and debt costs, providing the most relief to those companies and asset types that were most adversely affected by the current lack of coverage. Given the negative impacts on the real estate industry in just the past 8-10 weeks, we now believe that a bill is more likely today than it would have appeared even four weeks ago. We believe even the passage of a bill and no new attack will still see the real estate industry worse off than pre-9/11, but it is still the best case scenario. In an effort to assess the degree of negative impact, we have outlined the consequences of each of four different scenarios on the industry below. We believe companies in the most sensitive sectors (e.g. BXP, BPO, EOP, VNO, RSE, and SPG) will be the biggest winners in positive scenarios (such as Scenario 1) and the biggest losers in the negative scenarios (Scenario 3). (Current prices: BXP $37, BPO $18, EOP $28, VNO $42, RSE $30, SPG $31.)

Scenario Analysis: Real Estate and REITs

Scenario 1: A bill is in place, no attack occurs. As it pertains to the real estate industry, and with particular focus on the landlord (often time the public landlords are REITs), we believe:

- After rising to exorbitant rates post 9/11 (and becoming unavailable in many circumstances) market rates on new terrorism insurance policies begin to fall. Terrorism insurance again becomes widely available.
- The passage of a bill would eventually see the return of liquidity to mortgage and single asset CMBS markets, particularly those involving higher profile “trophy” assets (e.g. skyline CBD assets).
- Although some asset classes allow for occupancy costs to be billed back to tenants (e.g. commercial and retail), we believe higher insurance costs are effectively shared by landlords and tenants regardless of property type. For this reason, the somewhat lower costs that would likely accompany a terrorism bill would benefit both landlords and tenants.

Potential winners/losers. We believe valuations of companies in the most sensitive sectors already reflect some of the negatives associated with the current lack of easily available terrorism insurance (though they do not appear to reflect any major discount as a result of potential exposure to another terrorist event). The passage of a terror bill would lead to more extensive insurance coverage, and potentially lower insurance and borrowing costs for companies such as BXP, BPO, EOP, VNO, RSE, SPG, etc. Less sensitive companies/sectors that are currently experiencing fewer impacts would benefit, but to a lesser extent.

Scenario 2: No bill is passed, no attack occurs. The absence of any passage of a terrorism bill, even without an additional terror attack, is clearly a negative for the REIT sector. We believe this scenario would lead to:

- A sharp rise in operating expenses to cover extremely high insurance and security costs. Landlords begin to question the ability of insurers to meet future terror claims.
- Some landlords may choose to forego expensive terrorism insurance, which would have ramifications on borrowing conditions:
 - 1) Borrowers may fall into technical default on secured loans, which could precipitate some adjustment to both terms and rate.
 - 2) Rating agencies might respond with cuts to credit ratings, making alternative, non-secured borrowing more costly and less accessible.
 - 3) Construction financing and takeout financing become landlord headaches.
- CMBS liquidity becomes more limited and may even dry up, particularly for those real estate assets perceived as more vulnerable. Initiating new single skyline asset CMBS transactions becomes impossible; rates on multi asset CMBS deals also go up, reflecting higher risks.
- Reduced liquidity in the real estate market negatively impacts real estate valuations, particularly for those assets typically financed with secured debt.
- Banks likely eventually begin originating secured loans, but increasingly seek cross-collateralization or recourse when high profile assets are involved.
- Rental rates slow further than they already have as tenants respond to rising occupancy costs.

- For the tenants, occupancy costs may rise up to or even exceed expense stops. Most affected assets will likely be office/high-rise, or other perceived-to-be-vulnerable properties (e.g. regional malls).

Potential winners/losers. The lack of a terrorism insurance bill (despite the lack of terror attack) would serve to raise operating and borrowing costs as well as cause the most exposed companies to take on more risk by self-insuring. We believe that the values of stocks in the most sensitive sectors only partially reflect these negatives, and could therefore face more multiple contraction if it becomes clear that no affordable terrorism insurance will become available. As in Scenario 1, the less sensitive sectors will also be negatively affected, but to a lesser extent.

Scenario 3: No bill is in place, an attack occurs. This represents the worst scenario for real estate owners. In assessing the impact on the industry (and on REITs specifically), we believe it is necessary to examine the initial and longer term impacts:

- Initial impacts:
 - 1) There will be a sharp rise in operating costs due to much higher insurance costs (expect tenants to experience higher occupancy costs up to the entire expense stop limitation).
 - 2) The CMBS market (both single- and multi-asset transactions) likely freezes for all asset types, but particularly for the skyline assets and the asset class targeted in the attack.
 - 3) Landlords assess the value of continuing with terrorism insurance coverage given the potential inability of insurers to meet future claims.
 - 4) Secured borrowing rates spike, limiting liquidity in this market.
 - 5) Non-secured corporate borrowing for REITs is the only remaining alternative, but higher perceived risk drive rates up sharply after rating agencies focus on ratings.
 - 6) Real estate values fall sharply due to limited insurability and dramatic drop in real estate debt liquidity.
- Longer-term impacts:
 - 1) Congress ultimately establishes some sort of federal backstop or “Pool Re” program.
 - 2) This will likely result in the return of some normalcy in the real estate markets, with values appreciating, but operating costs still higher than pre-9/11 levels.

Salon.com, March 2, 2002 Saturday

HEADLINE: A Democratic senator goes nuclear on the White House

BYLINE: By Jake Tapper

HIGHLIGHT:

Nevada's Harry Reid talks with Salon about why he joined the GAO lawsuit against Dick Cheney and why he called George W. Bush a liar.

BODY:

It's nuclear war. Or nuclear waste war, at any rate. It began on Feb. 15, when President Bush announced that he would formally recommend Yucca Mountain, 100 miles northwest of Las Vegas, as the site where the United States would bury its nuclear waste. And it has accelerated this week, as Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate, filed a "friend of the court" brief with the General Accounting Office's lawsuit against Vice President Dick Cheney. The GAO -- and Sen. Reid -- want to know more about the private meetings Cheney held with energy executives as the administration was developing its energy policy.

That information, Reid believes, will explain the Yucca Mountain decision. "President Bush has broken his promise," said an angry Reid shortly after the White House decision. "All Americans should be concerned, not just because he lied to me or the people of Nevada and indeed all Americans, but because the president's decision threatens American lives."

The next day, according to a knowledgeable source, White House chief of staff Andrew Card called Reid three times to discuss why the senator had called the president a liar. Reid did not return any of the calls. But Reid obviously stands by his words. During the presidential campaign, Bush assured Nevada's citizens that he would not ship nuclear waste to any proposed site "unless it's been deemed scientifically safe" -- a vow, says Reid, that he made to win Nevada, a state whose electoral votes he desperately needed (and ended up carrying by just 3.4 percent).

Nevada politicians have long fought attempts to turn their state into a dumping ground for the 77,000 tons of nuclear waste stockpiled throughout the country (as well as the 2,000 tons of new waste generated each year). Since Congress picked Nevada's Yucca Mountain as a nuclear waste site in 1987, more than $4 billion has been spent, by some estimates, on studying the suitability of the site. Energy Secretary Spencer Abraham told reporters, "It is my strong belief the science supports the safe use of this repository." But Reid cites the General Accounting Office, the Inspector General of the Department of Energy, the Inspector General of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and the Nuclear Waste Technical Review Board as all having raised various concerns about the decision to proceed with the Yucca Mountain site.

The decision is anything but final; GOP Nevada Gov. Kenny Guinn has 60 days to object to the decision; he is expected to formally file his objections to the choice by April. Congress will then have approximately three months to override Guinn's objections, which promises to be a tough fight.

In the meantime, Reid is convinced that the task force list will explain what went wrong. "There is no question that Vice President Cheney met on several occasions with nuclear power executives," Reid said on Monday. He charged that after energy executives met with Cheney's task force, Bush "flip-flopped on the issue, and I think these meetings had something to do with it."

The White House vehemently denies Reid's assertions. "The president made the right decision for the country, after a thorough review by the EPA and the Department of Energy found the site to be scientifically safe," White House spokesman Scott McClellan told Salon. "As far as the issue of the lawsuit, we welcome the opportunity to fight for the important principle of the president being able to get open and candid advice to make sound public policy decisions."

On Thursday afternoon, Salon talked with Sen. Reid about the growing legal battle with the White House.

It's a fairly bold move, suing the administration. How did you make this decision?

I feel that President Bush was elected president of the United States because he carried Nevada. And he carried Nevada in an unusual way. He came to Nevada once during the entire campaign. He came to Lake Tahoe. And he refused to answer questions from reporters because of the nuclear waste issue. Al Gore was way out in front on the nuclear waste issue, and he was way out in front in state polls. So later in the campaign Bush sent Cheney to the state a couple times to say that they would be just like Clinton and Gore on the issue and the decision would be only based on sound science.

Since then there have been scientific reports about Yucca Mountain. GAO reported that there are 292 investigative reports about the site that have not been done. The Nuclear Waste Review Board has said that the science surrounding the decision to store waste at Yucca Mountain is poor. But Energy Secretary Abraham has said the opposite.

There is an absolute, determined conflict of interest at the Department of Energy because Spence Abraham gets legal advice from the law firm Winston and Strawn, which is also advising the Nuclear Energy Institute, which is the umbrella for the nuclear power industry.

Anyway, the reason I've taken this step is because I feel that the president misled the state of Nevada. He didn't tell the truth. I also believe that the meetings Vice President Cheney had with energy executives where he came up with the energy policy of this country could have been a determining factor in the recommendation President Bush gave about Yucca Mountain. We do know that Cheney met with a significant number of nuclear power generators. We want to find out who he met with, what happened in the meetings, what they discussed.

The Democrats in the Senate and the House have been criticized by some commentators for being timid in their criticisms of Bush and Cheney. You, on the other hand, are suing them.

Here's how I feel about that: I know a war is going on. I understand that; I appreciate that. And I think the Democratic leadership has been coming together to try to solve our problems. But despite the war going on, this is not a dictatorship. The government is three separate but equal branches of government. I have just as much of a right to speak out as the president does. The fact that he's popular right now doesn't mean I won't speak out about things I disagree with him on.

What's been the reaction from your fellow Democrats to the lawsuit?

I have heard from my friends in just the last few days. They've told me that they're glad I did it. It's kind of "Follow me, I'm right behind ya." Any reaction from Republican colleagues?

I haven't had any of those coming over and patting me on the back.

There are risks involved in suing the administration. You might be known as litigious. Might be dismissed that way. Have any political consultants expressed to you a fear of your becoming the Dan Burton of the Senate?

No, that doesn't bother me. I'm a lawyer; I've been to court lots and lots of times. It was my business 20 years ago. I try to be judicious when I criticize courts or when I attempt in some manner to use the courts.

Do you actually suspect that something fishy occurred during those energy task force meetings?

Of course I do, absolutely. I think this administration is so tight with the oil companies and the powerful utilities in our nation that we have an energy policy that's been dictated through Cheney that is now the word on the street that the administration is pushing. Sure it's fishy. Why are they refusing to give us this information? If it isn't fishy then it appears fishy just because they won't give us the stuff.

Now Bush supporters behind the scenes are arguing that Congress has exempted itself from many of the laws requiring the disclosure of deliberative advice, the Freedom of Information Act, and other sunshine laws that require politicians to disclose whom they get advice from. Is it fair to ask the White House to live up to a standard from which Congress exempted itself?

This is such an old-fashioned statement. It sounds like they've gone back and picked a page or two from Newt Gingrich's notebook. We're a separate but equal branch of government. The president has the right through his tremendous powers to do all kinds of things when it comes to rulemaking and meetings held. And we have the right to ask about it. For them to ask why don't we disclose is so amateurish it's hardly worth a retort. The White House considers itself to be fighting for a principle, that the president ought to be able to receive open and candid advice without interference from others. That they should be able to make public policy decisions free from politics.

There's no question that the president and the vice president receive tons of private information to help them develop policy. Either one-on-one people come to see them, or from their staff after people come to visit with their staff.

But here it's a different situation. The president of the United States set up an energy task force to come up with an energy plan for the nation. He assigned as the head of that Cheney. You remember the bucket of tears they cried when Hillary Clinton was coming up with the healthcare policy and she was forced to turn over her records. You can't speak out of both sides of your mouth on this. What's good for the goose is good for the gander.

It's totally different from information they receive to come up with the policy for Afghanistan. It's different than the policy as to what he's doing with the Cabinet and those meetings -- those are private. We understand that. But this is different, this is a task force.

An argument I've heard you make is that the action of shipping nuclear waste across the country -- requiring maybe 100,000 trucks going through 42 states -- is dangerous. But others argue that tons of high-level, highly radioactive nuclear waste have been shipped cross-country without incident. Have there been incidents that alarm you?

There are a number of examples of environmental groups following these trucks, knowing where they are, and they easily could have done something mischievous or something very bad to these trucks. Frankly I can't think of any incidents with high-level nuclear waste but we recently had one with low-level nuclear waste in West Wendover on the Utah-Nevada border. A truck was leaking nuclear waste; it just happens. And that example is one we know about; there are a number we don't know about because they keep 'em quiet. There was a serious incident they found with nuclear waste being shipped from West Valley, N.Y. So the answer is yes, I know of incidents.

And go back a few short months ago. There was a tunnel in Baltimore that caught fire and burned for a week. Trains go through that; that was a train tunnel. This will be 77,000 spent fuel rods going through the country. With Sept. 11, with terrorists looking for targets of opportunity, this will be thousands of trucks and thousands of trains and thousands of targets of opportunity. We know you can pierce one of these canisters with a military weapon, one that an individual can fire. But is keeping the waste where it is necessarily any safer? There are 131 nuclear power plants in 39 states. "More than 161 million people live within 75 miles of one or more of these sites," Abraham said, arguing that it would be better to secure the waste in one location than in 131 different locations.

This guy's a Harvard Law grad; he should go work on his script a little better. He uses this argument, that we've gotta have it in one site instead of 130. But we're always gonna have those 130 sites - they're still producing energy! They're not going to go away. This is simply foolish.

Another thing these people, these Harvard lawyers, say is, "Well then what should we do with it?" Leave it where it is. These are dry cast storage containers that are easy to secure, and cheap to secure for the next 100 years. I'm confident that then the great scientific minds of America can determine something over the next few decades as to what to do with the spent fuel rods.

The one question you haven't asked me is, am I afraid of White House retribution. Of course I am but you do what you have to sometimes. One last one then. Your state went for Bush in 2000. You think that will happen in 2004?

Not a chance. And we've got one more electoral vote now. He doesn't care; he doesn't need Nevada anymore -- I guess that's the reasoning. But he would not be president without having carried Nevada.

an interview of Rep. Dan Burton, Chairman of the House Government Reform Committee. Asked by Judd if he has requested that the Administration relent in its opposition to releasing Justice Department documents relating to possible FBI corruption in mafia informant cases, Burton said, "Oh, have I ever. I've had the Justice Department before my committee I think two or three times now. I contacted and talked with Mr. Gonzalez, chief counsel to the President. I've met with Attorney General Ashcroft and his chief lieutenants over at the Justice Department. I think all presidents don't like the thought of Congress looking over their shoulder." Asked about the Administration's secrecy, Burton said, "I think they're going too far. I have very high regard for President Bush. I think he's doing a good job with the war and getting the economy moving again. But he's getting some very bad advice on executive privilege and the use of his executive power." Asked if there was "irony" in the fact that he is "proving you're an equal opportunity bitch," Burton said, "No. I think I have a death wish. I don't think I want anybody to like me." Asked by HPR's Brian Howey about the White House's lawsuit with the General Accounting Office, Burton said, "It looks like they're trying to keep something from the public. I don't think they have anything to hide, but that doubt is there. The Democrats are not going to let up on that. The war may wind down and people are going to start looking at the economy, unless there's another terrorist attack. If the Democrats keep beating on that drum, it could be a major factor in the election. I want there to be openness. President Bush senior, his popularity was about 90 percent after the Gulf War. He lost. This is three years from the next election. The President's popularity is sky high, but that could change in 30 days. I think they're building up a lot of good will, but could go down if the American people start to distrust him. I don't want that to happen." Asked how much longer he planned to remain in Congress, Burton said, "I'm one of the senior members on International Relations. We have a new procedure now for picking a new chairman. They are elected by the caucus. Henry Hyde had told me he's going to run one more term and I would like to be considered for the chairmanship."

HEADLINE: CONGRESS HEARS A SORDID FBI TALE

BYLINE: EDMUND H. MAHONY; Courant Staff Writer

A former chief Connecticut prosecutor, in testimony that at times was taunting and at others dripped with sarcasm, told Congress Wednesday that groundbreaking organized crime investigations were sabotaged by renegade FBI agents.

Austin J. McGuigan, chief state's attorney from 1978 to 1985, described to stunned members of the House Committee on Government Reform how gangsters penetrated the state's fledgling parimutuel gambling industry in the 1970s and '80s, then murdered potential witnesses to throw investigators off the track.

McGuigan's most compelling testimony concerned his belief that corrupt FBI agents working in Boston deliberately withheld evidence from state and local authorities around the country in an effort to destroy investigations associated with the jai alai industry -- and protect the killers, who were their informants.

"It is clear that major organized crime figures operating as informants were permitted to engage in racketeering activities with a wink from, if not the tacit approval of, federal agents," McGuigan said.

Over the past year, committee members have learned during hearings that one of those agents, H. Paul Rico, who retired from the FBI in 1975, was hired a year later as vice president and director of security for World Jai Alai of Miami, which operated jai alai frontons in south Florida and Hartford.

During an appearance before the committee last spring, an unrepentant Rico argued with members when confronted with evidence that he helped frame four innocent men for murder. During a second appearance earlier this month, he invoked the Fifth Amendment and declined to answer questions. On Wednesday, McGuigan reserved some of his sharpest sarcasm for Rico, who he said allowed mobsters to be employed by World Jai Alai, contrary to his apparent duties as security director.

"I was somewhat puzzled by that," McGuigan said, adding that "quite frankly, from our perspective, organized crime was being made to feel at home by World Jai Alai."

McGuigan and a few other veteran organized crime investigators have spoken privately for years about the bizarre set of circumstances surrounding mob penetration of Connecticut's jai alai industry. But listeners couldn't believe that the FBI, an institution then long judged to be above reproach, was behind it all.

McGuigan said that when three key witnesses in the jai alai cases were murdered in the 1980s, he would have laughed off any suggestion that one day he would be asked to address Congress on the subject.

"We thought the bad guys had won," he said. "To me, today, it is touching that I'm here and that so many people who worked so long to uncover the truth have passed away and have not seen justice done."

After nearly a year of hearings into improper behavior involving FBI agents and their informants, members of the committee gave McGuigan a warm reception.

"I consider these hearings some of the most important hearings that Congress can have," said Rep. Christopher Shays, R-4th District.

Previous efforts to examine the mob penetration of the jai alai industry have sputtered because of the difficulty of keeping track of the wide cast of characters.

As McGuigan, who in 1973 became the first Connecticut prosecutor with statewide jurisdiction over organized crime and corruption, testified about his experience, committee members listened raptly, sometimes goggle-eyed. Chairman Dan Burton, R-Ind., periodically interrupted to demand relevant documents from the Department of Justice.

In a related development, Burton announced late Wednesday that he had reached an agreement with the Bush administration that will allow his committee to review Justice Department documents related to its investigation of FBI misconduct in Boston.

In December, President Bush asserted executive privilege to block the committee from reviewing internal Justice Department documents, sparking a face-off over the constitutionality of congressional oversight. Bush argued that congressional review of deliberative documents could lead to political second-guessing of decisions in criminal matters.

Internal FBI memos and other federal documents the committee and others already have obtained back up McGuigan's central contention -- that mobsters from Boston's Winter Hill Gang tried to take over World Jai Alai in order to skim profits. At the center of the plot were the Winter Hill Gang's co-leaders, James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi. Bulger and Flemmi were multiple murderers who also served, collectively for decades, as top informants for the FBI's Boston office. Rico was instrumental in recruiting Flemmi as an informant. Recently, a special Justice Department task force indicted Bulger and Flemmi for the three jai alai murders, including that of World Jai Alai owner Roger Wheeler Sr. of Tulsa, Okla.

A compelling body of evidence gathered by the committee and others suggests that some FBI agents in Boston obstructed investigations -- including those involving jai alai -- to protect Bulger and Flemmi from arrest. McGuigan said Bulger and Flemmi were part of a "war on organized crime that went amok."

"Violent crimes, including murders by so-called informants, were ignored at the whim of law enforcement agents who were, apparently, accountable to no one," McGuigan said. "In the name of intelligence-gathering, state and local prosecutions of violent criminals were undermined and investigations were betrayed."

When Connecticut investigators began following organized crime into World Jai Alai, agents in Boston withheld crucial information, McGuigan said. Moreover, he said, they tipped off targets of the investigation. Finally when potential witnesses began being killed, he said, federal authorities in Boston undercut Connecticut investigators.

At one point, McGuigan said, Rico, using information from police sources in Boston, tipped off an investigative target to information collected by the Connecticut State Police. The target was John B. Callahan, a reputed Winter Hill associate who became president of World Jai Alai and was later murdered in Florida. Callahan's body was dumped at the Miami airport on the day McGuigan and state police detectives arrived, hoping to persuade him to cooperate.

"They tanked our investigation," McGuigan said. "I realized we weren't playing for the same team."

Rep. William Delahunt, D-Mass., asked if McGuigan began to smell a rat:

"Did the smell become more putrid at that point?"

"Yes," McGuigan said. "It was troubling."

McGuigan said charges probably never would have been filed in the jai alai murders if Flemmi had not been arrested in 1995 and used his informant status as a defense.

"These are murders that seemed unsolvable, and it seemed the coverup had succeeded," McGuigan said, "until ... Flemmi decided to claim that he had a free pass on the crime train, because of his status as an FBI informant."

HEADLINE: Justice relents on FBI files

BYLINE: By P. MITCHELL PROTHERO

The Justice Department has agreed to allow investigators from a House committee access to some documents related to FBI criminal investigations. After President Bush claimed executive privilege in December, the House Government Reform Committee threatened to hold the administration in contempt of Congress.

Most of the documents relate to several FBI scandals concerning the use of informants in organized crime investigations in New England during the 1960s and 1970s.

"I want to thank the attorney general and the White House for working with us as we have been trying to uncover the corruption that existed in the Boston FBI for four decades and do our part to right a tragic wrong," said Committee Chairman Dan Burton, R-Ind.

The committee had subpoenaed as many as 15 documents and prosecution memos involving the use of testimony by Joe "The Animal" Barboza in several Mafia trials in the late 1960s and the use of two Boston mobsters as confidential informants, James "Whitey" Bulger and Steve "The Rifleman" Flemmi, from 1975 to 1995.

Bulger and Flemmi are suspected of having ordered or committed as many as 20 slayings during that period as the men allegedly consolidated control over the Boston organized crime community, despite working with the FBI. Burton has demanded any documents that discuss the decision by the Justice Department not to prosecute the men until 1995 despite the widespread belief they were using their FBI relationship to help the criminal enterprise.

In a related case being looked at by investigators, it appears the FBI knowingly allowed four men to be convicted in 1967 of a murder, despite clear evidence the men were not involved.

In the Senate, Sens. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa; and Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., have introduced legislation to increase oversight of the FBI and to give the Justice Department inspector general the authority to investigate abuses within the bureau.

Thank you for the opportunity to speak to you this morning about the status of ~~sharing-coordinating~~ health care resources between the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) and the Department of Defense (DoD). As you know, President Bush ~~is committed to improving access and quality of health care delivered to our nation's veterans and military beneficiaries.~~ ~~t~~The President has ~~made-expanded-identified~~ expanded collaboration operation between the VA and DoD health care delivery systems as a top priority for his Administration, listing improved interagency coordination between VA and DoD as one of his top management agenda items to benefit both VA and DoD beneficiaries. Additionally, ~~on Memorial Day 2001,~~ ~~T~~the President further demonstrated his personal commitment to veterans ~~and military retirees~~ by signing an Executive Order on Memorial Day 2001 establishing the President's Task Fforce to ~~improve~~ Health Care Delivery for ~~O~~ur Nations Veterans (PTF).

You will hear more about the ~~The~~ PTF this morning from Dr. Gail Wilensky, Co-Chair of the President's Task Force; however, I want to ~~is~~ reexpress the Department of Veterans Affairs strong commitment to supporting the activities and deliberations of the PTF as the Members reviewing barriers to Sharing and Interoperability; and collaboration for a VA/DoD Consolidated Mail Order Pharmacy (CMOP) pilot.

~~—The complexity and magnitude of the two health care delivery systems and their health information systems present a challenge in building health data repositories for each organization that can handle the large number of health records, appropriately ensure privacy and security, and support sharing of information.~~

Sharing Capital Assets

For a number of years, consideration of potential sharing with local DoD facilities has been part of VA's Major Construction planning process. As a result, and several joint facilities —discussed later in the statement—are currently in operation. VA recently completed a review of cCapital aAsset requirements infrastructure in the Chicago area and plans to complete reviews of needs for the rest of the country during the next two years. As we conduct these reviews we will involve DoD counterparts at both the local and national levels to assure that we do not miss opportunities to better serve our beneficiaries.

VA and DoD collaboration in the North Chicago area provides As an outstanding example of the mutual benefit of interagency capital asset sharing. The VA and the Secretary of the Navy and I Department recently signed an agreement to transfer 48 acres of VA land at the North Chicago VA Medical Center to the Navy Great Lakes Naval Recruit Training Ceenter. The land will help the Navy modernize their recruit training facility and, in exchange for the land, the Navy has agreed to purchase electricity and steam-steam from a VA-sponsored co-generation energy center that will result in substantial energy savings in the future. Additionally, through a special North Chicago Task Force established by the Co-chairs of the VA/DoD Health Executive Council and the Surgeon General of the Navy, the VA and the NavyDoD are also continuing to explore short and long term options for improved coordination of health care delivery, including review of the possibility of establishing a joint medical facility serving both veterans and Navy Great Lakes personnel at the North Chicago VA campus.

Regional VA-DoD Resource Sharing

As the VA/DoD Health Executive Council has established a number of work groups to make recommendations to improve cooperation, including a group specifically reviewing joint facility utilization and resource sharing, VHA and DoD leadership across the country have begun to engage in more vigorous coordination initiatives. For example, On a regional level, DoD's Mid-Atlantic Region (Region 2) and VA's Veterans Integrated Service Network (VISN) 6 recently met in November 2001 to discuss potential measures to maximize interagency use of federal resources in the area. The group plans to build on successful collaboration efforts in laboratory and pathology. Laboratory and pathology "Centers of Excellence" have been designated for facilities to purchase laboratory and pathology services at considerable savings. Region 2/VISN 6 are currently exploring establishing a joint community based outpatient clinic in eastern North Carolina and consolidated surgery services in the Portsmouth/Hampton, Virginia area.

Formatted

Also, VHA's VISN 20 and DoD's Northwest Region 11 held meetings in the fall and winter of 2001 to discuss additional opportunities for improved coordination. Many areas of promise were identified including: physician staff support in a number of specialties; nursing support and education; VA use of DoD operating rooms, VA clinics' use of DoD military treatment facilities (MTFs) for referral laboratory services, inpatient urology, and emergency hospitalizations; VA's use of DoD's contract for referral laboratory services; and examining 220 region contracts in excess of $24 million to consolidate procurements and make use of existing shared-use contracts.

Local VA-DoD Sharing

Although the senior leadership of VA and DoD are attempting to provide greater leadership support and direction for improved interagency coordination at all levels of interaction, sharing between VA and DoD at the local level is not a new or static concept. As a matter of fact, health care officials almost universally declare that "health care is local," making facility level coordination efforts extremely important to improving health care delivery to our beneficiary populations. The recognition of the value of interagency collaboration between VA and DoD is at least 20 years old and the nature of collaboration over the past two decades has been dynamic, reflecting changes in law, changes in leadership, and changes in the way we deliver health care in the United States.

As you know, Congress passed the "VA and DoD Health Care Resources Sharing and Emergency Operations Act" in 1982, and amended it in 1992.

Innovative leadership at the local and regional levels has leveraged this authority to benefit military and veteran beneficiaries.

~~Prior to TRICARE, it was easy for local officials to develop an agreement to share health care resources. Under TRICARE, sharing with VA became more complicated. At many locations, VA can provide outstanding specialty care and advanced diagnostics but does not currently have the capacity to provide primary care to large numbers of TRICARE beneficiaries. However, under TRICARE, if a provider does not supply primary care services, referrals are less likely to be made to that provider for specialty care and advanced diagnostics.~~

Currently, there are 165 VA Medical Centers with at least one sharing agreement with a DoD partner. Most MTFs also participate. At the close of FY 2001 tThere were 604 agreements covering 6,602 services ~~at the close of FY 2004~~. Most agreements cover diagnostic and ancillary services such as clinical pathology, radiology, audiology, and nuclear medicine. These agreements provide both VA and MTFs with a cost effective mechanism to secure expanded capacity to meet the health care needs of their beneficiary populations and also provide both departments with an alternative to TRICARE provider networks procuring services through potentially more costly private sector sources.

It should be noted, however, that the direct sharing relationship between VA and DoD has changed over the years and is currently in decline. The number of agreements has declined from nearly 1,000 to 604 from FY 1998 to FY 2001 while the total number of services covered in all agreements dropped from nearly 10,000 to 6,602 in the same time period. Total VA reimbursable collections from agreements reached a high figure of $32.5 million in FY 1999, declining to $27.9 million in FY 2001. VA purchased from DoD $23.9 million in services in FY 1999. This figure declined to $20.4 million in FY 2001. With the DoD roll-out of the TRICARE managed care support contract program, use of mMany of these direct sharing agreements between local facilities are not being used have been suspended, but VA (even though the departments still lists these agreements as “active”) because MTFs local facilities frequently do not formally cancel their interagency direct sharing agreements them.

We also have many VA/DoD agreements that involve reserve units from the {Army, Army National Guard, Naval Reserve, Air Force Reserve, and Air Force National Guard}. Eighteen of VHA's 21 Veterans Integrated Service Networkss (VISNs) have agreements to provide physicals to Army Reservists working with the Department of Health and Human Services' Federal Office of Occupational Health.

Joint Ventures

Joint ventures are designed to avoid duplication of medical facilities, expand access to services for federal beneficiaries, and to curtail federal health expenditures through 'economies of scale.' The seven main VA/DoD joint venture sites are listed below:

TRICARE and VA

In 1995, DoD established the TRICARE program to deliver health care services to its beneficiary population through regionally based managed care support contracts. VA provides services to TRICARE beneficiaries as long as veteran beneficiaries are not negatively impacted. VA Medical Centers currently have 134 contracts to provide services. TRICARE earnings, still relatively small, are steadily increasing ($ in millions):

However, as of September 30, 2001, only 90 VA Medical Centers reported reimbursable earnings from TRICARE. The degree of participation varies considerably from one facility to another based on a number of factors.

Prior to implementation of the TRICARE program, it was relatively easy for local VA and DoD officials to develop an interagency agreement to share health care resources. Under TRICARE, however, the nature of interagency sharing has shifted from direct sharing between equal federal partners to VA primarily functioning in a subcontractor role, making sharing between DoD and VA more complicated.

Many VA facilities do not have the capacity to offer primary care to large numbers of TRICARE beneficiaries in some areas, even though VA can provide outstanding specialty care and advanced diagnostics in the same area. However, under TRICARE, if a provider does not supply primary care services, referrals are less likely to be made to that provider for specialty care and advanced diagnostics. While not a universal trend, this tends to limit the referrals for specialty treatment as well. In, in some other locales, TRICARE contractors have been less than enthusiastic in welcoming VA participation when they already have well established networks of providers or, in some instances, there are exclusive contracts or special relationships with other providers.

Finally, VA Medical Centers have had difficulty in performing administrative functions and have made uneven progress toward eliminating TRICARE billing inefficiencies such as collection of co-payments at the point of service, data and coding accuracy, and billing of other “primary” health insurance (after which TRICARE is secondary payer). However, progress is being made. VHA is plans to issue a directive outlining proper TRICARE billing procedures. A variety of different formats are being explored using a variety of methods such as training software, videotapes for individual training credit, and satellite broadcasts. In FY 2001, 21 VAMCs were reimbursed at least $100,000, up from 19 in FY 2000.

We are continuing to work with DoD to assure that To meet the President’s objective of enhancing health care for both VA and DoD beneficiaries through improved interagency coordination and resource utilization, VA believes that future TRICARE beneficiaries can avail themselves of health care from VA. Over one million veterans are dually eligible for both VA and DoD health services, and we believe there are opportunities to better serve them and to do so cost effectively. VA believes that it would be most cost effective for DoD to view VAMCs VA Medical Center Agreement on the appropriate future role of VA in the DoD TRICARE program is important to future collaboration between VA and DoD. This issue is also under discussion with the President’s Task Force.

We appreciate being allowed to participate in DoD's discussions concerning the next generation of TRICARE contracts. VA is represented on the TRICARE Management Activity's Steering Committee on the Next Generation of TRICARE Contracts. This committee is currently making decisions on how future TRICARE contracts will be structured.

VA believes that it would be most cost effective for DoD to view VA Medical Centers as extensions of the Military Health System in the next round of TRICARE contracts. One way to maximize the use of federal dollars would be to eliminate cost sharing for TRICARE beneficiaries who select VAMCs Medical Centers as is now the case when a TRICARE beneficiary is treated in an MTF. If DoD were to agree to this proposal, TRICARE Program costs would likely be reduced and beneficiaries would also save out of pocket expenses.

VA administrative costs are much higher under TRICARE than with sharing agreements established directly between a DOD facility and a VA medical center. Moreover, the government usually pays more for the services provided under TRICARE than is required because of profit margins that the vendor must realize. MTFs should have the flexibility of using TRICARE dollars as a funding source to provide services to DOD beneficiaries without going through TRICARE provider networks. In essence, TRICARE contracts and their copayment structure should encourage beneficiaries to obtain health care from VA and the Military Health System.

Conclusion

VA and DoD are working at all levels to expand and improve our sharing relationships. In addition to those specifically discussed, we continue to cooperate on homeland security, contingency planning, and emergency management. is working with senior leadership from DoD to expand and improve our sharing relationships. We have made progress in recent years, but I believe we can do more. Dr. Chu and I have have committed to ensuring that both our departments work together as effectively as possible.

This concludes my statement. My colleagues and I will be pleased to answer any questions members of the SubCommittees may have.

VA and DoD cooperation and will identify opportunities for improved partnerships. As the lead executive agency charged by the President with providing support to the PTF, VA funds PTF operations, provides primary and subject matter expert staff support, and supplies the PTF with information and data as requested. We view the work of the PTF as vital to shaping our future relationship with DoD and Work groups have been formed in acquisitions and purchasing, benefits services, facilities, IM/IT, leadership and productivity, pharmacy, and resources/budget process. Four “critical” areas are currently being explored: policy barriers to conducting business; coordinated resource planning; facility/regional planning and business development; and barriers at the facility level. We look forward to receiving the interim report fromef_ the PTF this summer and the final report in March 2003.

There is no question enhanced collaboration between VA and DoD has the potential to improve services to our respective beneficiary populations, increase government efficiencies by decreasing the costs of providing bifurcated health care services and veteran’s benefits to DoD and VA beneficiaries, and improve utilization of our health care facilities. Over the years VA and DoD have been actively engaged and have enjoyed successes; however, much work remains to be done and VA welcomes the opportunity to expand our partnership with the Department of Defense. As a matter of fact, the Secretary of Veterans Affairs recently identified for the President eight areas of emphasis for increased coordination of services between VA and DoD. –and I understand that DoD has also proposed additional opportunities for increasing efficiency and coordination of benefits between our two departments. I am confident that working together, we will reach agreement on developing a common set of recommendations that our Departments can implement and our beneficiaries can endorse.

To accomplish the goal of improving coordination to achieve greater benefits for our beneficiary populations, the Departments have established two joint executive councils to explore areas where we can improve or enhance sharing activities. The VA/DoD Health Executive Council is an ongoing collaborative venue between the leadership of the Veterans Health Administration and the Department of Defense health care executives DoD Health Affairs. This council and has been reinvigorated in the last year through establishment of new goals, work groups, and accountability. Based on the successful Health Executive Council model, the VA/DoD Benefits Executive Council was recently established to provide an official forum for senior level interaction between the Veterans Benefits Administration and the DoD Office of Force Management Policy.

To increase the tempo of interaction between substantive actions taken by our two Departments and demonstrate leadership commitment to providing our beneficiaries with a seamless transition from military to veteran status, Dr. David S.C. Chu, Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, and I have recently begun to hold joint meetings of the Executive Councils to ensure that we receive regular updates on joint strategic planning activities and initiatives, provide guidance and policy direction on collaborative initiatives, and ensure that Department level administrative issues are not overlooked in individual Executive Council discussions. We plan to hold these joint meetings on a quarterly basis.

I was privileged to host our first joint meeting on February 11, 2002, at the Department of Veterans Affairs. During our inaugural meeting we had an opportunity to focus on several key issues that have direct impact on the future success of our VA/DoD collaborative initiatives. The specific areas of discussion included: –standardized billing and reimbursement rates; joint procurement initiatives; computer based patient medical record initiatives; Defense Enrollment Eligibility System (DEERS); coordination of capital Investments; and planning for the receipt of the recommendations of the Presidential Task Force to Improve Health Care Delivery for Our Nation’s Veterans.

While much work remains to be done and we will target our future studies to improve health care services, benefits delivery, information sharing and capital asset coordination, it is important to note that, – Dr. David Chu, DoD’s Deputy Secretary for Personnel and Readiness, and I recently initiated the Secretarial level VA-DoD Executive and Health Benefits Councils. These two panels will meet quarterly and will work together to improve coordination between the Departments in such areas as health care services, benefits delivery, information sharing and capital asset coordination.

However, VA and DoD executive leadership at the National, regional, and local levels have been working jointly for several years to improve and expand sharing with significant ~~and much progress has been accomplishments to credit~~. ed. Nationally, VA and DoD have made progress in the joint development of clinical practice guidelines. ~~The two Departments have~~ The VA has taken a leadership roles in the promotion of patient safety and DoD has benefited from our experience and is adopting our program. We are saving significant taxpayer dollars through joint procurement efforts, primarily in pharmaceuticals. We are pursuing better transmission of health data between the two agencies, improved coordination of capital facilities planning and use, and improved resource sharing between our regional organizations and local facilities as well as increased VHA treatment of DoD TRICARE ~~icare~~ beneficiaries.

Joint Procurement

Although we will need to engage in significant discussions to iron out potential implementation details, both VA and DoD have identified improved partnering for health care procurement as an action needed to ensure better coordination of DoD and VA services. Experience has clearly demonstrated that our combined purchasing power results in significant financial savings to both VA and DoD, allowing us to better utilize our budgets to the benefit of our respective beneficiary populations. For example, -VA and DoD entered into a Memorandum of Agreement (MOA) with DoD in December 1999 to combine the overall purchasing power of our the two Departments and eliminate redundancies. The MOA has two completed appendices, one dealing with pharmaceuticals, the second, encompassing medical and surgical supplies. A third appendix covering high-tech medical equipment is being finalized.

Formatted

~~To reduce duplication between the two departments,~~ As part of the MOA and in an attempt to reduce duplication between the two departments, DoD agreed to eliminate their Distribution and Purchasing Agreements (DAPAs) for pharmaceuticals and to rely upon VA's Federal Supply Schedule (FSS) for pharmaceuticals by ~~in~~-late 2000. As a result, DoD's DAPAs were eliminated in January 2001 for all pharmaceuticals that are available under VA's FSS program. Under VA's FSS pharmaceutical program, combined expenditures for Fiscal Year (FY) 2001 were $3.5 billion ($2.5 billion purchased by VA and $1 billion purchased by DoD). This same process, converting DoD DAPAs to VA's FSS program, is being utilized for medical and surgical supplies. The first data feed was completed in December 2001 and conversion is expected to be completed by December 2002. Once the appendix for high-tech medical equipment is signed, contracting responsibilities will alternate between the Departments and will allow both Agencies to place orders against the resulting contracts.

Another important area of the MOA focuses on joint procurement of pharmaceuticals. As of February 20, 2002, there were 57 joint-VA/DoD joint contracts for pharmaceuticals; 35 additional joint contracts are pending award; and 30 proposed joint contracts are ~~are~~ waiting to be processed. The ~~total~~-estimated cost savings in FY 2001 for both Departments from these contracts were ~~were~~ totaled $98.3 million ($80.1 million for VA and $18.2 million for DoD). These savings were obtained from 43 contracts. We have not yet received the actual cost savings figures for the contracts awarded to date during this fiscal year, but believe savings will continue to grow. ~~and i.~~ It is difficult to project how much additional savings will be achieved due to the dynamics of the pharmaceutical market place. For example, future pharmaceutical costs are strongly impacted by non-procurement related actions such as, i.e., branded products going generic and the clinical strategies employed by both Departments in the provision of their drug benefit. On the other hand, upcoming pharmaceutical Many of ~~these contracts will be considered for joint VA/DoD contracting activity as the contract period expires for individual contracts and we are optimistic that significant savings will continue to be calculated.~~

~~To further improve collaboration and reduce health care costs for both departments~~Also, VA is proposing legislation to allow DoD to directly utilize the VA Revolving Supply Fund for medical supplies, equipment and services procurement. ~~We believe that enactment of this provision~~ This amendment will facilitate cooperative management of significant VA/DoD acquisition programs.

Information Technology

~~The development of compatible information technology systems may be one of the most important areas that VA and DoD address in an interagency manner in the coming year. Both VA and DoD spend significant amounts of taxpayer funds annually on the information technology and information management programs supporting our two missions. Yet, in spite of our best efforts to date and the requirements of both departments for similar information over the life-cycle of a member of the armed services, incompatibility of VA and DoD information management and technology systems is one of the most frequently noted impediments to increased coordination between the two departments, resulting in duplication of workload, promulgation of inefficiencies, and inability to communicate critical data in an efficient manner. As the Government~~General Accounting Office (GAO) noted in ~~their~~ a recent report, we currently do not have a complete single repository of active service members' and veterans' health data that can be used to ensure continuity of care, improve health care delivery, and provide valid, reliable data for disability claims.

~~Last fall, however, VA, DoD, the Indian Health Service, and other agencies began a substantially expanded health information system, entitled Health~~People, whose purpose is to improve sharing of health information; develop and adopt common standards; seek appropriate opportunities for joint procurements and/or building of systems; work toward improved, model health information systems; and explore the potential convergence of VA and DoD health information software applications.

The improvement in information technology compatibility and establishment of a single electronic patient record top the VA/DoD coordination agenda of this Administration. With respect to information technology coordination and health data repositories or databases, specific actions are being taken through the VA/DoD Health Executive Council and are being monitored by senior department leadership through our Joint Executive Councils forum.

For example, - the VA/DoD Health Executive Council Information Management and Information Technology Work Group manages the VA/DoD interagency Government Computer-based Patient Record (GCPR) program, recently renamed the Federal Health Information Exchange (FHIE) to better reflect the intent of the program. The goal of FHIE is to make DoD data available to VA clinicians with the highest functionality at the lowest cost. VA and DoD are establishing a national repository under the Government Computer-based Patient Record (GCPR)/FHIE Project that allows for sharing of select DoD patient data at VHA locations. The transfer of DoD data to VA is in the testing phase. In this fiscal year, VA and DoD are developing a joint business case and implementation to address the interoperability of GCPR/FHIE with CHCS II, DoD's new system in development, and VistA, VA's patient information system. It is anticipated that aAdditional phases of this project will support DoD viewing of VHA information.

Other information technology sharing efforts already underway between DoD and VA through the VA/DoD Health Executive Council include: Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996 (HIPAA) --; standards development; pharmacy initiatives; technology integration laboratories; VA/DoD Laboratory Data Sharing and Interoperability; and collaboration for a VA/DoD Consolidated Mail Order Pharmacy (CMOP) pilot.

While these ongoing efforts are significant and we hope to realize substantial progress through them in moving toward more seamless information transfer, we are continuing to explore additional opportunities for collaboration to improve delivery of care at the patient level and to better utilize taxpayer dollars. For example, DoD is establishing a national patient record using a Health Data Repository product from a commercial vendor. VA intends to pursue a comparable solution and has staff working with DoD on a regular basis. VA also intends to explore the potential with DoD to create a second phase to this effort that supports creation of government-owned repository architecture/software, not dependent on vendor technology. This architecture/software could also be used throughout government to create health care repositories that can easily share patient information.

Looking to the future, last fall VA, DoD, the Indian Health Service, and other agencies began to look at the potential for a substantially expanded health information system, entitled HealthPeople, whose purpose is to improve sharing of health information; develop and adopt common standards; seek appropriate opportunities for joint procurements and/or building of systems; work toward improved, model health information systems; and explore the potential convergence of VA and DoD health information software applications.

—As we pursue the short, mid and long term goals of delivering health care and maintaining adequate medical records for our nation's military and veterans in a seamless fashion, it is important to recognize the magnitude of the undertaking and remain focused. The complexity and magnitude of the two health care delivery systems and their health information systems present a challenge in building health data repositories for each organization that can handle the large number of health records, appropriately ensure privacy and security, and support sharing of information. To address these unique challenges in establishing better linkage between the VA and DoD information management and technology, DoD and VA are currently considering separate data repositories to ensure privacy and security and to reduce the consequence of any failures. It is our expectation that both repositories will be operational before 2005, with common data standards to support retention of records from DoD and VA.

GCPR is being renamed the Federal Health Information Exchange (FHIE) to convey more accurately the original and current intention of this interagency activity.

- ~~DoD is establishing a national patient record using a Health Data Repository product from 3M. VA intends to pursue a comparable solution and has staff working with DoD on a regular basis.~~
- ~~DoD and VA are currently considering separate repositories to ensure privacy and security and to reduce the consequence of any failures. We expect both repositories to be operational before 2005, with common data standards to support retention of records from DoD and VA.~~
- ~~VA intends to explore potential with DoD to create a second phase to this effort that supports creation of government-owned repository architecture/software, not dependent on vendor technology. Subject: cert -- money involved

I am not passing judgment on the merits or ultimate outcome of the Nextwave case (about which I know nothing), but for purposes of the cert predictions, it does bear mention that, according to Stern & Gressman, the money involved could be a factor in whether the Supreme Court grants cert: "The fact that especially large amounts of money are involved in litigation over the issue of statutory construction may also be a persuasive factor, though normally not sufficient by itself unless the amount is enormous." P. 188.

I did not get this correspondence -- it must have gone to someone else.
Since I am spelunking for the next three days, the only way I could help on this is if you were to fax it to me.

Brett -- thanks so much for your help with Law Day. In speaking with Beverly Mondin (the Bar Association Executive Director) this morning, she asked if I could obtain a photo and biographical summary of Judge Gonzales for inclusion in the next newsletter. Any help on this would be appreciated. The deadline for submitting the newsletter to the printer is March 15th. My address here is:

I believe it's the slowest circuit (or perhaps second slowest) in the country. There's a year's backlog on death penalty cases because they can't assign visitors or district judges to those.

Rebecca -
Just to let you know, we have changed the project to make participation on an opt-in basis, and have revised the wording of the waiver to be more in accord with that used in the Sept. 11 program.
I've also received Brett's comments - thanks for passing them along - and have, mostly, adopted his suggestions.
There was concern, however, about Brett's suggested deletion of eligibility of compensation for non-economic losses. This would depart from the Sept. 11 model, and might also prevent compensation from being awarded to shorter-term hostages who were not physically injured. We would rather not make this change - but please let me know how you feel about this.
I'm standing by, per your request, until I hear from you about the judgment fund issue.
Regards -
Louise

Our press office already alerted the press to the Thur. 2:00 schedule, but presumably that can be rescheduled. I don't know Feinberg's schedule for Friday, but I think we had told him previously that it could be Thur. or Fri., so I assume either would work. Feinberg's preference would be Thur., as you can imagine.

The WH event is set for 1:15 -1:30, so, assuming DOJ goes tomorrow, 2 or even better, 3, is fine. One question -- if communications wanted Feinberg to go Friday, is it really too late for such a change. I do not expect a request for one, but want to know status of DOJ event. John -- pls advise. I just talked to John Wood. Right now, there is nothing in the regulation addressing this issue. But Feinberg may be asked about it, and my current understanding is that DOJ is awaiting a policy view from here on the question. So the ball may be in our court.

Bottom line is that we should hear further word from DOJ at some point soon. Jay Lefkowitz asked that we notify him by e-mail as soon as we hear anything from DOJ, and I said that we would.

The Honorable John J. LaFalce
Ranking Member
Committee on Financial Services
U.S. House of Representatives
Washington, DC 20515

Dear John:

Thank you for your letter of February 28 regarding the Administration's views on deposit insurance reform.

The Administration applauds the House Financial Services Committee's efforts to move forward with this important issue. We support several provisions of H.R. 3717 that would accomplish objectives consistent with the recommendations that Assistant Secretary Bair outlined in testimony last year and as re-affirmed in the President's 2003 Budget. Merging the bank and thrift insurance funds would improve the system's capacity to diversify its risks. Allowing the insurance fund reserve ratio to fluctuate within a range and eliminating triggers that could cause sharp changes in premiums would reduce the pricing structure's pro-cyclical bias. Improving the FDIC's premium-setting authority should ensure that institutions with rapid insured deposit growth appropriately compensate the fund while taking into account the past contributions of many institutions to build insurance fund reserves.

However, the Administration continues to believe that the deposit insurance coverage level should remain unchanged. There is no evidence that an increase in the coverage level would promote competition or materially improve the ability of community banks to obtain funds. An increase in coverage would primarily benefit high net worth individuals and do little for the great majority of savers, who have deposit balances far below the current coverage limit. For those with substantial deposits, ample opportunities already exist to obtain FDIC coverage equal to several multiples of $100,000. Moreover, raising coverage could weaken market discipline and increase risk to the FDIC and, ultimately, taxpayers.

Thank you again for writing. We look forward to working with the Congress, the FDIC, and others in the coming year to achieve a stronger and fairer deposit insurance system.

Sincerely,

Paul H. O'Neill

The Honorable Michael G. Oxley
Chairman
Committee on Financial Services
U.S. House of Representatives

Dear Mike:

Enclosed is my response to a letter from John LaFalce asking for the Administration's views on deposit insurance reform, including higher coverage limits.

As we discussed at lunch recently, I applaud your efforts to move forward with deposit insurance reform. Several provisions of H.R. 3717 would advance objectives that we strongly support. Nonetheless, the Administration continues to believe that the deposit insurance coverage level should remain unchanged.

We look forward to working with you, the Committee, the Congress, and the FDIC to reach a consensus on a reform package that will make our deposit insurance system stronger and fairer.

Sincerely,

Paul H. O'Neill

I think that this letter works from the media standpoint. It reiterates the three arguments for not testifying that the Governor has expressed to the media since he was sworn in.

Subject: SECOND DRAFT of letter to Sens. Byrd and Stevens

March 8, 2002

Dear Chairman Byrd and Senator Stevens:

Thank you for your letter earlier this week to Assistant to the President for Homeland Security Tom Ridge. The President and the Administration greatly appreciate the continued interest and involvement of you, the Committee on Appropriations, and the entire Congress in the critical homeland security issues facing the Nation. And we share your view that it is essential for Federal, state, and local governments to work together closely as part of the significant and sustained national effort to defend the United States and the American people.

The Administration is committed, moreover, to ensuring that you and the Congress receive the appropriate information you need with respect to the Administration's homeland security policies and practices. As you know, the various Executive Branch departments and agencies with responsibility for homeland security continue to provide substantial amounts of information to Congress. Executive Branch officials such as Attorney General Ashcroft, Director Mueller of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and Director Allbaugh of the Federal Emergency Management Agency have regularly testified before Congress about homeland security and other issues. Director Daniels of the Office of Management and Budget has regularly testified and provided information on issues related to the budget. OMB and the relevant department heads have line responsibility, of course, for their budgets. In addition, Governor Ridge and other Presidential advisors have met with and provided briefings on homeland security and budgetary issues to many Members of Congress and their staffs on innumerable occasions in the last six months. Governor Ridge also has met with the entire Senate recently by speaking at lunches with the respective party caucuses. These kinds of activities -- all of which are designed to ensure that Congress has the information it needs to perform its constitutional functions -- will continue in the future.

In your letter, you also request that Governor Ridge formally testify before your Committee. The long-standing position of Presidents of both parties, a position long respected by Congress, is that members of the President's staff do not ordinarily testify before congressional committees. This position, which is rooted in the Constitution's separation of powers, has long applied to Presidential advisors such as the Chief of Staff, the Counsel, the National Security Advisor, and the other immediate advisors of the President, such as Governor Ridge. Therefore, we respectfully must decline your invitation for Governor Ridge to formally testify before the Committee, but also wish to emphasize that Governor Ridge remains available to meet with you and your colleagues as appropriate.

The Administration will continue to work closely with the Congress and provide Congress appropriate information on issues related to homeland security. Thank you again for your letter and for your work on these critical issues, and please do not hesitate to contact me with any questions.

Sincerely,

Nicholas E. Calio
Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs

Will this be a letter to Burton? A memorandum to Judge Gonzales? A memo to the file? Please let us know what you'd like.

Ed:
As we had discussed previously, we think it would be appropriate for OLC to prepare a memorandum that explains/summarizes the dispute with Burton and the precedent reaffirmed in that matter.
This is obviously not urgent. Thanks.

Adrian, Please find attached a draft invitation for Janet Ashcroft Women for Talent in Springfield. In order to have 2 weeks to mail and for turn around time, I have to get this to the Printer by Tuesday COB. Your help in turning this around as quickly as possible is most appreciated.

Please let me know what you will need from us as you begin to prepare Mrs. Ashcroft for the trip. What worked well for Mary Matalin and Karen Hughes was a very detailed schedule of all events (Women for Talent luncheon and press opportunities) and luncheon script (which included bios on all participants and talking points). Let me know if that is what you would also like; Rich Chrismer (press), Miriam Stonebraker (political) and Esther Munch (scheduler) will be able to give you whatever you need.

Also, may we release Mrs. Ashcroft's visit to the press this week?

Obituary: Carol Los Mansmann / Respected judge with long list of career firsts
Monday, March 11, 2002
By Marylynne Pitz, Post-Gazette Staff Writer

Carol Los Mansmann, the first woman appointed to the federal bench in Pittsburgh, won friends with her lively personality and the respect of judges and lawyers with thorough, well-reasoned opinions.

A judicial centrist who served three years in U.S. District Court before her elevation to a federal appeals court in 1985, Mrs. Mansmann, 59, of Sewickley, died Saturday at UPMC-Montefiore of breast cancer. In 1996, she underwent a bone marrow transplant.

After President Ronald Reagan appointed her to the U.S. District Court in 1982, the 39-year-old was sworn in by Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. She told well-wishers at the time that she had come a long way for a Polish girl from Dormont.

In September, O'Connor came to Duquesne University to receive the first Carol Los Mansmann Award for distinguished public service, where she described Mrs. Mansmann as one of "a distinguished class of jurists."

As a tireless trailblazer, Mrs. Mansmann put in long hours.

"She worked constantly. I could never figure out how she could accomplish so many things in one day," recalled Barbara M. Carlin, who was Mrs. Mansmann's first law clerk after she took the federal bench and one of her many proteges.

A 1996 opinion on an affirmative action case written by Mrs. Mansmann for the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeal drew national attention.

She held that the Piscataway, N.J., school board violated the 1964 Civil Rights Act by retaining a black high school teacher and laying off a white teacher of equal seniority and qualifications. The judge wrote that "a nonremedial affirmative action plan, even with a laudable purpose, cannot pass muster."

Some affirmative action supporters were frightened by the judge's conclusion that racial "diversity" was not an objective of the Civil Rights Act. The case was headed to the U.S. Supreme Court before it was settled, and civil rights groups feared that the Supreme Court would use it to outlaw racial preferences in employment.

From the start of her career, Mrs. Mansmann excelled and enjoyed a succession of firsts. She was one of only two women graduates in Duquesne law school's class of 1967. But only one local law firm granted her an interview and it did not hire her.

After Allegheny County District Attorney Robert Dugan gave her a job in 1968, she became the first female prosecutor in Allegheny County to try a murder case.

Chief U.S. Magistrate Judge Kenneth Benson recalled why Mrs. Mansmann took the challenge of prosecuting a homicide.

From 1968 to 1972, she worked in the appeals division of the district attorney's office, where she defended prosecutors' legal positions. In that job, she had the luxury of reading trial transcripts and began second-guessing her colleagues, asking them why they failed to raise objections or make certain requests of the trial judge.

The queries frustrated assistant district attorneys, who insisted to Mrs. Mansmann that she did not understand how difficult it was to always think clearly during the heat of a trial. So, she tried a case and won a first-degree murder conviction.

Afterward, Benson said, she conceded that her colleagues were right. From then on, he added, Mrs. Mansmann simply defended her fellow prosecutors while drafting appeal briefs. That experience and her appellate expertise paved the way for her trip to the U.S. Supreme Court on April 27, 1970. On that date, she became the youngest woman to argue before the nation's highest court, and won a significant constitutional case that Benson still teaches his students today.

In its decision in the case, Chambers vs. Marone, the high court broadened the power of police to search automobiles once they had arrested a driver and passengers.

From 1974 to 1979, Mrs. Mansmann was employed as a special assistant attorney general. During that same period, she maintained a private practice with the now defunct law firm McVerry Baxter & Mansmann, that included her husband, attorney J. Jerome "Jerry" Mansmann. Long before her elevation to the federal appeals court, Mrs. Mansmann encouraged women to pursue careers in the law. While finishing a bachelor's degree at Duquesne in 1964, she befriended a freshman named Donetta Wypiski, who planned to become a teacher. With Mrs. Mansmann's encouragement, Wypiski obtained a scholarship, earned a law degree, became a prosecutor and was elected to the state bench in Westmoreland County. In January 1994, Donetta Wypiski Ambrose rose to the federal bench in Pittsburgh.

Looking back on the early days of their friendship, Ambrose recalled why she looked up to Mrs. Mansmann.

"She was smart. She was nice. She was popular. She was friendly. She was Polish. I was Polish. It was a connection," Ambrose said.

Mrs. Mansmann took pride in her ethnic heritage and once began a speech to a Christian Mothers group at a Polish church by greeting them in Polish. The audience, Carlin said, went wild with approval. Even as she maintained a law practice, Mrs. Mansmann also served as an associate professor at Duquesne's law school from 1974 to 1983. From 1987 to 1994, she was an adjunct professor of law.

In that academic post, she encouraged a whole generation of women to pursue legal careers. U.S. Magistrate Judge Ila Jeanne Sensenich said she was indebted to Mrs. Mansmann, personally and professionally.

"I remember one evening we were returning together by plane from a meeting we had attended. I was exhausted and anxious to get home and relax," Sensenich said. "Judge Mansmann was leaving for another meeting early the next morning and her secretary was meeting her at her home that evening for a few hours work."

Carlin, now a prosecutor with the U.S. attorney's office in Pittsburgh, said the judge taught her some important lessons.

"The law doesn't have all the answers in black and white. You have to look at the situation. You have to look at the people involved and above all, to apply the law in a very fair manner," she said.

While on the district court bench, Mrs. Mansmann displayed a special knack for settling civil cases.

During conciliation conferences, Carlin said, "she listened very intently to both sides, never dismissing anyone's position as ridiculous, out of hand, or unwarranted. She treated all the parties with absolute dignity."

On one occasion, Carlin recalled, Mrs. Mansmann quickly granted a one-day recess in a trial so that a lawyer could take his disabled son to college.

"She never forgot that she had been a practicing lawyer and that there was a life outside the law. I think that was because she was so very family oriented. She came from a large family," Carlin said.

Mrs. Mansmann's death is a loss to the bench and bar as well as to the community, said U.S. District Judge Donald Ziegler.

"She was a teacher in every aspect of her life. She lived her life with truth, kindness and wisdom, as instructed in Proverbs. She is now counsel to the angels," he added.

Senior U.S. District Judge Maurice B. Cohill Jr. said Mrs. Mansmann was "an extremely bright and cheerful person. Even at times when I know that she was under stress, she never lost that pleasant way of hers."

Friends will be received from 2 to 4 and 7 to 9 p.m. tomorrow and Wednesday at the H. Samson funeral home, 537 N. Neville St., Oakland. There also will be visitation Thursday from 9 until the 11 a.m. Mass at St. James Church, 200 Walnut St., Sewickley.

In addition to her husband of 32 years, survivors include their children, Michael, Casey and Patrick Mansmann, all of Sewickley, and Megan Gallagher of Los Angeles; sisters Gloria Baytosh of Orange, Calif., Patricia Burke and Kathleen Los, both of Gulf Port, Fla., and Rosemary Lieberman of Lake Havasu, Ariz.; and brother Larry Los of Santa Maria, Calif.

The first paragraph touches upon the possible bias against out-of-State plaintiffs with regard to settlements. However, the SAP should stress that we are trying to protect plaintiffs and defendants from the disadvantages flowing from class action litigation filed against them in States in which they do not reside. Specifically, our interest is in protecting them from having a State with which they have little contact decide their rights and responsibilities with regard to one another.

The Justice Department would add in the final sentence a reference to plaintiffs. So, the sentence would read something like this: "Federal jurisdiction for major class actions of this kind also would help protect out-of-State defendants, as well as out-of-State plaintiff class members, from local biases in cases that affect their substantial interests and therefore is consistent with and fulfills the Constitution's original design."

The DOJ letter went out last week. I'll fax you a copy. I've reviewed some other agency drafts. A number were minor. The most significant comments were from State and Defense. State's has gone up, and Ben Cohen at DOD is checking to see whether DOD's has too.

Subject: Counsel Approval Needed for White House E-mail Updates

IS&T has completed an e-mail system meeting Strategic Initiative's core requirements for sending mass e-mail updates. This system is in the final review stage before going up on the White House Web site. Before it goes up I'd like to have the Counsel's office review and sign off on the White House E-mail Updates system (Web site subscription form, confirmation and welcome messages, the frequently asked questions section, and methods of operation). I also want to make sure the system complies with the White House Web site privacy policy.

The subscription forms are available internally at this address: (the address will eventually be www.whitehouse.gov/email)
<http://staging.eop.gov/email/>

The FAQ section:
<http://staging.eop.gov/email/faq.html>

This system is active, allowing you to go through the subscription process, including the e-mail confirmation and welcome messages.

I also have print outs of the process if you would prefer to review it in hard copy format.

I am available for any questions you may have and will also be happy to arrange for any technical questions to be answered by IS&T.

Please let me know if I can assist with your review process in any way.

Thanks,
NEIL

Subject: Response to New York Times editorial

Anne and Karl think we need an op-ed response to Sunday's NYT editorial. Anne says they want the Judge to author it. I am happy to do the first draft along with Anne (that is what Anne wants). I think this could be a good opportunity to flesh out the dual process/substance message to frame the debate in the post-Pickering world. Let me know.

More corrections (I am afraid Lori's source has been misinformed): (1) the Visitor's Office has not decided how it will distribute to tix to staff or in what numbers, but it is very likely that some tickets will be distributed to staff; you will not need to line up with the public for NPS distribution. (2) Most of the events will NOT occur on the Ellipse.

The Visitor's Office is doing things differently this year. We will not get tickets. If you want tickets, the National Park Service will distribute free South Lawn tickets on two dates. The majority of the tickets will be available on Saturday, March 30, 2002, beginning at 8 a.m. The remaining tickets will be available on Monday, April 1, 2002, beginning at 7 a.m. These tickets will be distributed on a first-come, first-served basis at the Ellipse Visitor Pavilion at the southeast corner of 15th and E Streets, NW. Tickets will have timed-entries from approximately 10 a.m. - 2 p.m. Tickets are required for every attendee, including small children.

In our Admin meeting they mentioned that people line up for tickets really early.

Most of the festivities will happen on the Ellipse. You do not need a ticket for that.

I've gotten several questions about BB security lately and there is a lot of confusion on the topic. So I thought I'd set the record straight....
My plan would be to email this to all BB users.
Could you have someone take a look at it and let me know if you have any comments or changes?

Thanks- Tim

Frequently Asked Questions about Blackberry Devices

Q: What is a Blackberry? Is it simply a wireless e-mail device?

A: A Blackberry device is actually much more than a simple e-mail device. Internally it is an actual computer (i386 compatible), and is vulnerable to things like Trojan horses and viruses.

Q: Are all Blackberry devices the same?

A: No. Although they look alike, there are several different versions being sold. The EOP has two Blackberry versions, the PAR – Presidential Archive Records, and FAR – Federal Archives Records. PAR Blackberries are generally issued to White House users, while all other EOP users get the FAR models.

Q: What is the difference between the PAR and FAR devices?

A: Both devices look identical. The difference is their capabilities. The PAR Blackberries have a service enabled that allows them to communicate directly with other PAR Blackberries (called the “PIN to PIN” operation). This allows communication between the devices without going through the EOP communications system. This mode of operation is only allowed during emergency situations. When using this feature, it is important to remember that the emails are not encrypted and thus are susceptible to intercept. Thus, extra caution is called for when using the “PIN to PIN” mode of transmission. In order to comply with federal records management requirements, emails sent via the FAR Blackberry do not have the “PIN to PIN” mode enabled.

Q: Are Blackberry messages secure?

A: Not always. Although Blackberry devices do use encryption, the encryption is not always invoked. Email sent from your Blackberry to another EOP address will be encrypted and secure. However, email sent to all non-EOP addresses are unencrypted and non-secure when transmitted out to the INTERNET. You should not send sensitive or private information via your Blackberry to non-EOP addresses. Blackberry devices are not approved for transmitting or storing any type of classified information.

Q: Are Blackberry messages secure while they are on the Blackberry unit?

A: Only if you use the password feature to gain access to your unit. Users must always remember to protect their Blackberry device from unauthorized use by storing it in a secure location and enabling its password feature.

Q: What kind of information can be gathered remotely from a Blackberry unit?

A: Sensitive information can be gathered very easily within the broadcast range of the Blackberry device. This information includes: the individual device PIN number, and the To/From message addresses. Since a Blackberry device routinely transmits, a “hacker” that has associated a PIN number to an individual can then track the user location through the Blackberry device.

Q: Can blackberry devices be brought into Sensitive Compartment Information Facilities or other classified areas.

A: No. Blackberry devices are not allowed to be taken into in any Sensitive Compartment Information Facility (SCIF) or in any areas where the processing of classified information is allowed.

EOP Policies and Guidelines for Blackberry devices (Including other PDAs)

1. Classified information is not allowed to be stored or processed on any Blackberry. There are no exceptions to this rule.
2. Sensitive information, such as (EOP safe combinations, network passwords, or other access codes) may not be stored on Blackberry devices.
3. Personally owned Blackberry devices are not allowed to be connected to the EOP network, either remotely or locally.
4. Government issued Blackberry devices must be used in accordance with the EOP policy on Limited Unofficial Use of Government Office Equipment Including Information Technology, dated February 21, 2001.
5. Information entered or stored on government Blackberry devices may be searched, copied or removed at any time by authorized EOP personnel.
6. Material that is inappropriate for the workplace will not be downloaded or maintained.
7. Passwords must be used on Blackberry devices to protect them from unauthorized use.
8. The configuration of EOP Blackberry devices will be controlled by the Office of the Chief Information Office, Information Systems and Technology Division (IS&T). The CIO/IS&T support staff are the only authorized individual to add applications to EOP Blackberry devices. Any unauthorized software may be removed from any PDA without warning.
9. Use of interactive service ("PIN to PIN" or "Blackberry to Blackberry"), Internet messaging, voicemail and fax messaging capability on Blackberry devices) are authorized only during emergency situations. (Applicable to only the PAR Blackberry devices)
10. Information from Blackberry devices that should be preserved in office files as a record of official activities will be maintained by each user. Required information will be copied and stored in office files on a minimum of a monthly basis. Each user must comply with the record keeping policies of their respective EOP office or agency.
11. The OA/CIO/IST Customer Support Help Desk (202 395-7370) must be contacted if the following occurs:
 - The Blackberry is lost or stolen,
 - The Blackberry is damaged or becomes inoperable,
 - There is a change in employment status that effects the authorization to use the EOP issued PDA.

Barbara, fyi, I have received a voice mail message from Vanessa Blum at Legal Times (828-0342), asking me to talk to her, on or off the record, about the resolution of the Burton matter and the background of the dispute. She said she is working on a Thursday afternoon deadline. I do not plan to return the call, and if she calls again, I'll just refer the call to Public Affairs.

FYI, as the drumbeats accelerate, we're told that at his press dugout late this morning Sen. Daschle went "on and on" about "the need for Gov. Ridge to testify." The press office is expecting questions on this.

CIVIL JUSTICE REFORM

The first part of this memorandum outlines the foundation for the Administration's civil justice reform initiative. In order for the Administration to make progress in reforming America's civil justice system, the American people must understand the enormous costs that lawsuit abuse imposes on them as consumers, shareholders, and employees. In addition, they must understand that the Administration's proposals will protect legitimate victims' rights to obtain just compensation for their injuries and will strengthen the rights of consumers in securing counsel.

The second part of this memorandum describes a number of civil justice reform initiatives that we recommend the Administration either support or initiate. The Administration should frame the debate around popular, commonsense reforms (e.g., the Client's Bill of Rights, limits on the liability of small businesses), setting up a favorable negotiating dynamic for the more complex areas involving federalism and forum-shopping. Moreover, the Administration's support of these larger, more sweeping reform initiatives will complement the push for reforms in specific legislative areas (e.g., the Patient's Bill of Rights, terrorism insurance).

Reform of our current tort system is pro-growth, pro-job creation, pro-small business, and pro-productivity. The current system imposes an unnecessary, regressive, burdensome tax on workers, consumers, shareholders, and even victims of wrongdoing. And that must change.

I. The Case for Civil Justice Reform, Now More than Ever

The civil justice system must strongly protect consumers by ensuring that legitimate victims of corporate negligence or malfeasance have the ability to use the legal system to obtain justice and to receive fair and just compensation. But the existing regime is characterized by excessive payouts, lottery-style awards, and often, an inequitable division of the spoils among claimants and counsel. It not only fails properly to deter unsafe conduct, but it also often fails to compensate victims fully for their losses.

Escalating lawsuit abuse imposes enormous and varied costs on our economy. Consumers pay higher prices for fewer products. Shareholders lose value when stock prices drop as a result of a spurious lawsuit. Management's focus is diverted from building shareholder value to developing litigation strategies. Employees lose their jobs or receive reduced compensation as the companies for which they work are forced to cover excess litigation expense. Our jobs, income, and retirement savings are all ultimately tied to the performance of the companies that do business in America.

Excessive litigation results in a burdensome tax that threatens our economy's welfare – and ultimately the welfare of the American consumer. America's civil justice system is the most expensive in the industrialized world:

- The overall cost of our system is conservatively estimated at nearly $180 billion annually, or about 2 percent of GDP.

- A fund could be difficult to administer (who will handle claims, how will it be funded, what will be the standard for injury).
- If the public understands the FDA preemption rule and the fund to be a package deal, and legislation creating the fund is not enacted, then there may be calls to rescind the FDA preemption rule.

2. FDA Policy Statement on Preemption of Fraud-on-the-FDA Claims. In Buckman Co. v. Plaintiffs' Legal Committee, 531 U.S. 341 (2001), the Supreme Court ruled that federal law preempted a plaintiff's state-law claim that a medical device manufacturer had committed fraud on the FDA (that is, had knowingly misled the agency by submitting false documents or withholding information). The FDA could issue a policy statement stating that it understands the Supreme Court's decision to extend to drugs and biologics, as well as to negligence per se claims.

RECOMMENDATION: FDA should issue a policy statement extending Buckman.

PROS

- Although a policy statement is not binding on courts, many courts will take an FDA policy statement seriously.
- Issuing a policy statement is administratively simple.

CONS

- The public may view an FDA policy statement as a power grab that threatens the public health by limiting plaintiffs' access to the courts.
- Courts are beginning to extend Buckman on their own, and an FDA policy statement might be unnecessary and result chiefly in negative publicity. See, e.g., Nathan Kimmel, Inc. v. DowElanco, 275 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 2001). (extending Buckman to fraud on the EPA); Brasher v. Sandoz Pharms. Corp., 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18364 (N.D. Ala. Sept. 21, 2001) (extending Buckman to fraud-on-the-FDA claim in a drug case).

C. Other Measures

1. Adoption of Legislation Checklist. In 1991, President George H.W. Bush's civil justice reform working group proposed the adoption of a "legislation checklist." See 1991 Agenda for Civil Justice Reform in America. A list of common errors to be avoided in legislation would be developed and applied in the review of all proposed laws.

RECOMMENDATION: The President should issue an Executive Order directing federal agencies to evaluate proposed legislation in view of a checklist. In addition, the Executive Order could be used to highlight the deficiencies in our current civil justice system. Legislation would be evaluated for drafting problems (e.g., whether it adequately addresses statute of limitations or standards of proof issues). In addition, any legislation that addresses damages should be reviewed to ensure that punitive and non-economic damages are unavailable/limited and that exhaustion of administrative remedies is required.

2. Modifications to the Federal Rules. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure could be strengthened to limit lawsuit abuse in federal courts. Modifications could include:
- Strengthening of Rule 11;
 - “Three strikes and you’re out” law to punish lawyers who file frivolous claims,
 - Tightening of discovery rules to allow inquiry only into issues actually in dispute; and
 - Amendment of Rule 68 to clarify that if damages awarded after trial are less than a settlement offer, the plaintiff must pay the defendant’s post-settlement offer attorneys’ fees. Federal courts typically interpret Rule 68 to require the payment of costs to mean court costs (e.g., filing, witness fees), but not attorneys’ fees.

RECOMMENDATION: DOJ should initiate amendment of the Federal Rules by introducing amendments to the appropriate advisory committee of the Judicial Conference. Since this can be a lengthy process (it generally takes around three years to amend a rule from initial consideration by an advisory committee of the Judicial Conference through Congressional review), this action should be undertaken promptly.

3. Auto Choice Reform. A version of auto choice reform was endorsed by President George H.W. Bush in 1992. H.R. 1704 (Sponsor: Armey, 7 co-sponsors), the most recent version of this measure, would give consumers a choice between their state’s current auto insurance system or less expensive personal protection insurance (PPI), which provides no-fault coverage for economic damages only. Some economists estimate the scheme could reduce auto insurance costs by 24 percent. But some respected law-and-economics experts oppose it (George Priest).

RECOMMENDATION: A sub-working group that includes economists should be established to evaluate the issue.

- Costs have grown steadily over time, up from only 1.3% of GDP in 1970, and approximately 0.6% in 1950.
- By some estimates, 30% of the price of a stepladder, 55% of the price of a football helmet, and 95% of the price of a childhood vaccine is attributable to costs associated with litigation risk.
- Between 10 percent to 30 percent or more of medical diagnostic tests ordered in the United States are ordered as a precaution against possible charges of malpractice, not because the doctor needs the tests for a diagnosis.
- Less than one-half of the economic costs incurred in the course of litigation ultimately go to claimants.

The current system imposes what is essentially a “litigation” or “tort” tax on all goods and services that flow through the economy. Businesses, large and small, pass this tax along to consumers, employees, and other stakeholders. Large enterprises with deep pockets are clearly susceptible to frivolous plaintiffs’ claims. Small businesses are also significantly affected. This litigation tax limits small businesses’ ability to form, innovate, and be the primary source of new job creation. With three out of four new jobs likely to come from small businesses, this tax is one that the U.S. economy can ill afford.

Low-income Americans also pay a disproportionate share of the tax, with larger shares of their disposable income going to higher insurance premiums, increased medical costs, reductions in employment compensation and benefits, and increases in the prices of goods and services. This tax increases daily, undermining the Administration’s efforts to strengthen the economic recovery.

Class action lawsuits are particularly ripe targets for reform. The large lawsuits that threaten our economy very often do not benefit the plaintiffs in whose names claims are brought. The plaintiffs’ lawyers too often reap a disproportionate share of the bounty. Using a token representative plaintiff to get into court, entrepreneurial lawyers sue a defendant, gain the court’s permission to represent a large class, and negotiate a settlement. Because litigating is risky and costly, companies often settle even cases that have no merit. Lawyers may walk off with millions in fees while class members individually receive pennies on the dollar – or nothing at all – for alleged harms.

- For example, lawyers in Florida settled a class-action lawsuit, filed by flight attendants, against tobacco companies over secondhand smoke. The attendants received no money at all. Some of the money went to a nonprofit foundation to research smoking-related diseases, while lawyers made out with $46 million in fees.
- According to the Wall Street Journal, Bill Lerach, one of the most prominent plaintiffs’ lawyers, noted recently: “I have the greatest practice of law in the world. I have no clients.”

A majority of Americans intuitively understand that the current system is broken. And the better they understand the inequities of the system, the more inclined they will be to view the Administration’s reform package favorably.

II. Reforms the Administration Should Support or Initiate

A. Legislative Measures

- 1. Class Action Lawsuit Reform. A handful of State courts, through their certification and settlement of large-scale class action lawsuits, are effectively making law and dictating corporate behavior for 49 other States. Currently, a class action lawsuit brought in State court may be removed to federal court only if there is full diversity among the defendants and the named plaintiffs – i.e., no plaintiff is a citizen of the same State as any defendant. In addition, each class member's claim alone must exceed $75,000, even if the aggregate amount in controversy far exceeds this amount. These requirements make it easy for plaintiffs' lawyers to bring large class actions in favorable state forums, even where these lawsuits have significant interstate commerce implications and involve the residents and laws of multiple states.

The individual consumers on whose behalf these suits are brought often receive only a few dollars each from a class action settlement. Frequently, they do not even get cash, but instead receive a "coupon" for a noncash discount on one of the defendant's products. By contrast, the lawyers who bring the suits often negotiate very large fees.

Pending Legislation: The Class Action Fairness Bill. Two bills currently pending in Congress address these issues (H.R. 2341 (Sponsor: Goodlatte, 43 co-sponsors), S. 1712 (Sponsor: Grassley; co-sponsors: Carper, Hatch, Specter, Voinovich, Chafee, Kohl, Thurmond)). On February 6, 2002, the House Judiciary Committee held a hearing, and a mark-up of the bill is expected in late February. The Administration's support would help push these measures into the spotlight, although Senator Leahy and others can be expected to oppose any Senate action on these issues.

The bills' commonsense provisions include establishing a consumer class action bill of rights, requiring (1) notice of a lawsuit to class members in "plain English"; (2) judicial review of "coupon" settlements; and (3) prohibitions against court approval of proposed settlements providing for preferential payments to certain designated members of the class. In addition, the bills call for modification of diversity requirements for federal jurisdiction over class actions, such that cases would be removable if the aggregate amount in controversy exceeds $2,000,000 and there is minimal diversity (at least one plaintiff representative and one defendant are from different states), unless a "substantial majority" of the plaintiffs and defendants are from the same State.

RECOMMENDATION: The Administration should support the class action reform measures, with particular focus on the protection of rights of potential victims.

PROS

- The bills' notice and judicial review provisions would provide some consumer protections against the plaintiffs' bar.
- The bills could be used very effectively to highlight abuses of the trial lawyers (e.g., class actions where the class members ended up paying lawyers' fees, or received cereal coupons when their lawyers received millions in fees), demonstrating that the Administration is strongly on the side of potential claimants.

- Diversity reform would give federal courts – which are accountable to the entire country – jurisdiction over what are essentially interstate controversies with a substantial impact on the nation’s economy.
- Without diversity reform, a few state courts will continue to make law and dictate corporate behavior nationwide, causing a ‘race to the bottom’ of standards and resulting behavior. This is inconsistent with federalism principles and the purpose of federal diversity jurisdiction itself (i.e., provision of a federal forum that is less susceptible to local political pressures).

CONS

- The Administration’s support of the bills may be criticized as a favor to big business, which, it will be argued, will be the chief beneficiaries of the diversity reform measures. (Small businesses typically are not defendants in these lawsuits, since they are not the kind of deep pockets targeted by the plaintiffs’ bar.)
- The bills’ notice and judicial review provisions may be criticized as window dressing for a diversity reform bill that benefits big business.

2. Drafted Legislation: Client’s Bill of Rights Senator McConnell has drafted, but has not introduced, legislation that would create a “Client’s Bill of Rights.” Complementing the class action bill of rights legislation that is pending (above), such a law would require plaintiffs’ lawyers to give injured consumers full information about their services, as well as ensure that consumers pay reasonable fees for lawyers’ services. HALT, an organization of Americans for legal reform, also advocates such legislation.

The proposal’s commonsense reforms include the following elements: (1) a lawyer must provide a written agreement that informs the consumer of the likelihood of prevailing in a lawsuit; expected recovery; and all fee agreements; (2) injured consumers may not be contacted by lawyers or defendants’ insurance companies for 45 days after an event resulting personal injury or death; and (3) a class member has the right affirmatively to “opt into” a potential class action before being included in such a case, rather than having to affirmatively “opt out” in order to pursue an individual remedy.

Currently, the bill contains a provision that would give a plaintiff the right to an objective review of a contingent fee by a court or bar association to assure “fairness and reasonableness.” We believe that review of contingent fees for fairness may be administratively difficult and interfere with free market negotiations between lawyers and clients.

RECOMMENDATION: The Administration should support the Client’s Bill of Rights package, if the bill’s language is modified to emphasize fee disclosure rather than fee regulation.

PROS

- Makes clear that the Administration is on the side of the consumer and potential victims.
- Provides a vehicle for demonstrating plaintiffs' bar abuses.

CONS

- Would be vigorously opposed by the plaintiffs' bar and many members of Congress.
- Public may not view this as an issue of significant concern, since, for most people, dealing with a personal injury lawyer is an unusual event.
- May be legally vulnerable to challenge as exceeding Congress's Commerce Clause authority.

3. Liability & Diversity Reform Package. Current punitive damages and joint and several liability rules have the potential to impose unfair and excessive costs on defendants, which in turn affect consumers through higher prices and a burdened economy. In addition, federal courts do not have jurisdiction over many cases that implicate substantial federal interests – e.g., cases in which the amount in controversy is large (with a corresponding potential to affect the nation's economy), there is the possibility of numerous inconsistent state court judgments (e.g., in mass tort cases), or citizens of numerous states seek to sue defendants in multiple states.

Pending Legislation: Two currently pending bills address liability and diversity reform issues.

Small Business Liability Reform Act. First, S. 865 (Sponsor: McConnell; co-sponsors: Lieberman, Fitzgerald, Hutchinson, Voinovich) and companion bill H.R. 1805 (Sponsor: Hutchinson, introduced with six original co-sponsors (3Ds, 2Rs, one I)) would address the particular liability concerns of small businesses with 25 or fewer employees.

Specifically, the measure would, for federal and state courts, (1) modify the “joint and several liability” rule so that a small business defendant would be held liable only for the damages directly attributable to that defendant; (2) require punitive damages to be established by clear and convincing evidence; and (3) limit punitive damages to the lesser of $250,000 or three times compensatory damages. The bill also holds certain culpable sellers of products exclusively liable when their conduct is responsible for harm. This reduces the exposure of innocent product re-sellers that are simply a part of a product's chain of distribution.

NFIB and NAM have endorsed the bill. Arguably, S. 865 should be expanded to cover larger businesses, which are more affected by excessive punitive damages awards and joint and several liability rules.¹ In addition, a measure limited to very small businesses could be challenged as outside of Congress's Commerce Clause authority, since small businesses may have a relatively small effect on interstate commerce. But a law targeted at small businesses would likely be popular.

The Multidistrict, Multiparty, Multiforum Trial Jurisdiction Act. A pending diversity reform measure is H.R. 860 (Sponsor: Sensenbrenner, no co-sponsors) proposes federal diversity reform provision that would give federal courts jurisdiction over mass disasters (e.g., air crashes). As discussed below (see II.A.6), this bill also would amend section 1407.

RECOMMENDATION AND ISSUE FOR DECISION: The Administration should initiate a liability package and diversity reform package. The diversity portion of the package should (1) create a single federal forum for mass tort cases (the measure that is part of H.R. 860); and (2) permit removal of cases where the amount in controversy exceeds $500,000, even if only minimal diversity exists. The Administration must decide whether to take the more politically popular approach of proposing liability reform solely for small businesses (as in S. 865/H.R. 1805), or to expand coverage to larger businesses.

PROS

- The measure could be heralded as part of the Administration's new job-creating, small business initiative. Economic evidence indicates that liability reform, if enacted, would greatly benefit the economy, ultimately resulting in lower costs to consumers and more jobs.
- Even if the measure is not enacted, the Administration could use the measure to educate the public about the costs that the current system imposes on them.
- Without diversity reform, a few state courts will continue to dictate the outcome of interstate controversies that have the potential substantially to affect the nation's economy.

CONS

- The plaintiffs' bar will argue that punitive damages and joint and several liability rules serve to protect the consumer. Although we can demonstrate that consumers will ultimately benefit from liability reform through lower costs and more jobs, the public may view liability reform as measure that will primarily protect big business. As such, we must consider the threshold size of the firm, if any, at which we would forego structural reforms. The more 'special protection' we offer to small businesses, the weaker the opposition's case will be.
 - States may object that limiting a plaintiff's state law remedy impermissibly interferes in State affairs, and convincing Congress and the public that these measures are necessary will require taking a position that is critical of some state courts.
 - It may be difficult to characterize diversity reform as benefiting consumers, and the public may conclude it, too, more directly benefits big business.
4. Asbestos Litigation Reform. Asbestos claims are not abating, even though virtually all of the traditional asbestos defendants – and some companies that at one time were considered peripheral defendants – are bankrupt. Almost 60,000 new claims were filed in 2000, and new filings have accelerated in 2001. The overwhelming majority of these claims have been filed on behalf of people who are not sick. If these trends continue, it is inevitable that many people who ultimately develop cancer and other serious diseases in the future will go uncompensated.

Drafted Legislation: Asbestos Claims Priorities and Compensation Act. The National Association of Manufacturers (which represents a large coalition of asbestos defendants) has drafted a bill that would make “physical impairment,” defined under AMA guidelines, an essential element of an asbestos-related claim. It would also liberalize statutes of limitations to remove incentives for plaintiffs to file before they are ill, prohibit case consolidations (which can force defendants into settling large cases), and, to minimize forum-shopping, restrict plaintiffs to filing suit in the state in which they reside or where the exposure occurred. NAM believes that some members of the asbestos plaintiffs’ bar will not oppose their bill. They have Republican support for the bill in the Senate, and when they get Democratic support, they will introduce it.

NAM’s proposal is far more limited than legislation proposed by Congressman Hyde and Senator Ashcroft in 1999 and 2000, which established a defendant-supported fund from which victims’ claims would be paid.

RECOMMENDATION: The Administration should support the asbestos litigation reform bill, particularly in the context of other reform measures in this memorandum.

PROS

- Will preserve funds for victims who ultimately do become ill.
- Will reduce filings against asbestos defendants by unjustified claimants and avoid unnecessary bankruptcies with their corresponding effects on claimants, employees, shareholders, communities, and the economy.

CONS

- Asbestos reform has fallen apart before, and the Administration risks entering into a losing battle in which it is criticized for supporting legislation that would limit recovery for asbestos victims and let asbestos defendants off the hook.

- 5. Expansion of the National Vaccine Injury Compensation Program. The Vaccine Injury Compensation Program, 42 U.S.C. 300aa-10 et seq., is a no-fault alternative to the traditional tort system for resolving vaccine injury claims, whether the vaccine is administered in the public or private sector. The VICP is administered jointly by HHS, DOJ, and the U.S. Court of Federal Claims, and covers all vaccines recommended by the Center for Disease Control for routine administration to children, such as diphtheria, tetanus, measles, mumps, and rubella. A tax ($0.75 per antigen) is levied on vaccines and held in a fund. Compensation is determined either by settlement between plaintiffs’ attorney and DOJ lawyers or by a special master appointed by the Court. Awards include economic costs, pain and suffering, estimated costs of future care and attorneys fees. Compensation for vaccine-related death and pain and suffering and emotional damages are capped at $250,000. Punitive damages are unavailable.

RECOMMENDATION: The Administration should support legislation to expand the National Injury Compensation Program to cover vaccines that are in the “national interest,” such as anthrax or smallpox.

PROS

- By reducing their liability risk, manufacturers will not be discouraged from developing vaccines that will be needed in the event of bioterrorist attack.

CONS

- The Administration lobbied against inclusion of this measure in the bioterrorism legislation, and its support for the legislation in a different context could be viewed as an awkward policy shift.
- There is no track record for new vaccines from which to build the injury tables needed under the program that are used for compensation determinations. Without this experiential knowledge base, it would be very difficult to develop an appropriate schedule for compensation, which could lead to an outcry from consumers and the plaintiffs’ bar.

6. Modification of Federal Case Consolidation Requirements. Under 28 U.S.C. § 1407, the multi-district panel assigns similar cases to a transferee court only for consolidated pre-trial proceedings. See Lexecon Inc. v. Milberg Weiss, 523 U.S. 26 (1998) (ruling that transferee courts may rule only on pre-trial issues such as motions to dismiss and summary judgment and they may not conduct trial). A more efficient approach would permit a transferee court to rule on the merits of consolidated cases, because a single court could uniformly handle many more aspects of similar cases.

Pending Legislation: The Multidistrict, Multiparty, Multiforum Trial Jurisdiction Act H.R. 860 (Sponsor: Sensenbrenner, no co-sponsors) would amend section 1407 to permit transferee courts to retain jurisdiction over a case for trial purposes, with damages determined by the transferor court. H.R. 860’s amendment to section 1407 is coupled with a federal diversity reform provision that would give federal courts jurisdiction over mass disasters (e.g., air crashes). Senator Leahy opposes the diversity reform provision, and he has said he is unwilling to schedule H.R. 860 unless the House indicates that it would recede on the mass disaster provision.

RECOMMENDATION: The Administration should support passage of a measure that would amend section 1407.

PROS

- Amendment of section 1407 would enable federal courts to handle consolidated cases more efficiently, saving the litigants time and money.

CONS

- The public may view amendment of section 1407 as a modest reform measure that addresses a technical federal procedural issue.

B. Administrative Measures

1. FDA Drug Labeling Safe Harbor. The FDA reviews and approves every word on the label of any prescription drug product, and it requires manufacturers to obtain approval before modifying a drug label. Yet many courts permit lawsuits based on a claim that a drug manufacturer's label did not warn of a certain risk – even though the label fully complied with all federal safety requirements. Such lawsuits essentially allow a jury to second guess the FDA's judgment regarding a product's label. Empirical evidence shows that these decisions actually jeopardize the public health, since labels that are too complicated or long lead to consumers' ignoring all warnings.

RECOMMENDATION: FDA should promulgate a regulation expressly preempting tort failure-to-warn and other claims based on alleged deficiencies in a drug's label. FDA is currently drafting a final rule that will extensively revise drug-labeling requirements. It will promulgate the rule next year. To allow FDA to address preemption of all FDA-approved prescription drugs in this final rule, FDA should issue a notice this spring asking for comment on a preemption regulation, and it could issue the preemption regulation as part of the final drug-labeling rule.

In addition, some pharmaceutical manufacturers have proposed that the Administration consider initiating or supporting legislation that would create a fund to compensate injured victims as part of this preemption approach. Manufacturers would pay into this fund, which would be distributed to consumers injured by a manufacturer's product.

PROS

- FDA's revised labeling requirements will result in simpler, more focused labels that will better protect the general public health. Preemption of failure-to-warn claims that essentially assert the FDA's labeling decision was inadequate preserves the FDA's regulatory authority.
- Preemption of failure-to-warn claims will ensure that manufacturers are not asked to comply with inconsistent state and federal requirements.
- Giving manufacturers certainty regarding their potential liability will ultimately result in lower drug costs.
- Seeking comment on the preemption regulation will ensure that the regulation is not overturned by a court for APA reasons.
- Making a fund part of this plan will ensure that injured consumers are fairly compensated for their injuries.

CONS

- The plaintiffs' bar will characterize the preemption as less protective of the public health, pointing out that, in the past, many courts and the FDA itself have called FDA labeling requirements a "floor," not a "ceiling."
- Issuing a public notice asking for comment on a preemption regulation may galvanize the plaintiffs' bar into seeking congressional action to block FDA from taking this action.
- States may object to FDA preemption of state claims as inconsistent with federalism principles and an encroachment on their ability to protect their citizens' health.

State Joint and Several Liability Provisions

- Fourteen states and the District of Columbia allow unlimited joint and several liability:

AK, AZ, CO, IN, KS, KY, LA, ND, OR, TN and WY.

- Twenty-five states have limited joint and several liability:

CA: Joint liability has been abolished for noneconomic damages only.

CT: Defendants are generally only liable in proportion to their share of responsibility. If a defendant is insolvent or its share is otherwise uncollectible, the remaining defendants may be required to pay that defendant's share of the damages according to their percentages of negligence.

FL: If plaintiff is at fault, joint liability is abolished for: (a) any defendant found 10% or less at fault; (b) economic damages in excess of $200,000 for any defendant found to be more than 10% but less than 25% at fault; (c) economic damages in excess of $500,000 for any defendant found at least 25% but no more than 50% at fault; (d) economic damages in excess of $1 million for any defendant found more than 50% at fault. If plaintiff is not at fault, joint liability abolished for: (a) any defendant found to be less than 10% at fault; (b) economic damages for any defendant found at least 10% but less than 25% at fault; (c) economic damages in excess of $500,000 for any defendant found at least 25% but not more than 50% at fault; (d) economic damages in excess of $1 million for any defendant found at least 25% but not more than 50% at fault; and (e) economic damages in excess of $2 million for any defendant found more than 50% at fault. Joint liability does not apply to any defendant who is found to be less at fault than the plaintiff.

ID: Joint liability has been abolished, except in cases arising out of a violation of any state or federal law or regulation related to hazardous or toxic waste or substances or solid waste disposal sites, or any cause of action arising from the manufacture of any medical devices or pharmaceutical products.

IA: Joint liability has been abolished for non-economic damages. Joint liability has been abolished for economic damages for defendants less than 50% at fault.

- MA: Each defendant is liable to the extent of that defendant's proportionate share of the entire common liability, without regard to his relative degree of fault. Thus, in a two-defendant case, a defendant found 1% negligent can be compelled to pay 50% of the judgment.
- MI: Joint liability has been abolished, except in medical malpractice cases or criminal conduct involving gross negligence or the use of drugs or alcohol.
- MN: A defendant whose fault is 15% or less is only liable up to four times that defendant's percentage of fault.
- MS: Joint liability has been abolished to the extent needed for the plaintiff to recover 50% of damages.
- MO: If the plaintiff was at fault, joint liability is limited to two times the defendant's percentage of fault.
- MT: Joint liability has been abolished except for defendants found to be more than 50% at fault, except that joint liability shall apply in actions arising from an act or omission that violates a state environmental law relating to hazardous or deleterious substances.
- NE: Joint liability has been abolished for non-economic damages.
- NV: Joint liability has been abolished for defendants less at fault than the plaintiff, except in products liability actions, strict liability actions, or actions involving the emission, disposal or spillage of a toxic or hazardous substance.
- NH: Joint liability has been abolished for defendants less than 50% at fault.
- NJ: Joint liability has been abolished for defendants less than 60% at fault.
- NM: Joint liability has been abolished, except in strict liability cases, cases involving vicarious liability, or "situations not covered by any of the foregoing and having a sound basis in public policy."
- NY: Joint liability has been abolished for non-economic damages for defendants less than 50% at fault, except when the defendant is found liable for: (1) use, operation, or ownership of a motor vehicle; (2) having acted with reckless disregard for the safety of others; (3) certain provisions of labor law; (4) unlawfully releasing hazardous substances; and (5) product liability actions where the manufacturer of the product is not a party to the action, jurisdiction over the manufacturer could not be obtained, and liability would have been imposed on the manufacturer through strict liability.

- OH: Joint liability has been abolished for non-economic damages, but only if the plaintiff was contributorily negligent or impliedly assumed the risk that caused the harm.
- OK: Joint liability is abolished if the plaintiff was at fault.
- SD: Joint liability is limited to two times the percentage of fault of any defendant found to be less than 50% at fault.
- TX: Joint liability has been abolished except for defendants found to be more than 50% at fault. In cases involving toxic torts, a defendant is jointly liable if that defendant's fault is 15% or greater.
- WA: Joint liability has been abolished if the plaintiff is found to be at fault.
- WV: In medical malpractice actions, joint liability has been abolished for defendants found to be less than 25% at fault.
- WI: Joint liability has been abolished for defendants found to be less than 51% at fault.

State Punitive Damages Provisions

- Twenty-nine states and the District of Columbia have no limits on punitive damage awards (except by constitutional standards):

AZ, AR, CA, DE, DC, HI, ID, IL, IA, KY, ME, MD, MN, MS, MO, MT, NM, NY, OH, OR, PA, RI, SC, SD, TN, UT, VT, WV, WI and WY.

- Six states have abolished punitive damages completely:

LA, MA, MI, NE, NH and WA.

- Fifteen states have limited punitive damage awards:

AL: In nonphysical injury cases against large businesses, punitive damages are limited to the greater of three times compensatory damages or $500,000; in nonphysical injury cases against small businesses with a net worth of less than $2 million, limited to $50,000 or 10% of net worth up to $200,000; in personal injury cases, limited to the greater of three times compensatory damages or $1.5 million. Limits to be adjusted Jan. 1, 2003, and at three year intervals thereafter in accordance with the Consumer Price Index.

AK: Punitive damages are limited to the greater of three times compensatory damages or $500,000. In cases involving actual malice, punitive damages are limited to the greater of four times compensatory damages or four times aggregate amount of financial gain that the defendant received as a result of its conduct or $7 million.

CT: Punitive damages in product liability actions are limited to two times compensatory damages.

FL: Punitive damages are limited to the greater of three times compensatory damages or $500,000; if the trier of fact finds the defendant's conduct was "motivated solely by unreasonable financial gain" punitive damages may be awarded up to the greater of four times compensatory damages or $2 million; no cap applies if the defendant had a "specific intent to harm the claimant." Punitive damages may not be awarded more than once for a single act or course of conduct unless the court finds by clear and convincing evidence that the prior award was insufficient to punish the defendant.

GA: Punitive damages are limited to $250,000 unless the plaintiff demonstrated that the defendant acted with a specific intent to harm.

- IN: Punitive damages are limited to the greater of three times compensatory damages or $50,000.
- KS: Punitive damages are limited to the lesser of $5 million or the defendant's annual gross income. If the court finds that the profitability of the conduct exceeds the amount of the general limitation, the court may award an amount equal to 1½ times the amount of the profit which the defendant gained or is expected to gain as a result of the conduct.
- NV: Punitive damages are limited to three times compensatory damages if the amount of compensatory damages is $100,000 or more; and $300,000 if the amount of compensatory damages is less than $100,000. Limits do not apply to an insurer who acts in bad faith regarding its obligations to provide insurance coverage or in product liability actions.
- NJ: Punitive damages are limited to greater of five times compensatory damages or $350,000.
- NC: Punitive damages are limited to the greater of three times compensatory damages or $250,000.
- ND: Punitive damages are limited to the greater of two times compensatory damages or $250,000.
- OK: Punitive damages may not exceed the greater of $100,000 or compensatory damages. Where the jury finds by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant acted with malice or an insurer intentionally acted in bad faith, punitive damages may not exceed the greater of $500,000 or two times compensatory damages or the amount of the increased financial gain to the defendant.
- TX: Punitive damages limited to the greater of two times economic damages plus amount equal to non-economic damages up to $750,000, or $200,000.
- VA: Punitive damages may not exceed $350,000.

later than March 25, 2002 with the expectation that the release include the bulk of the relevant documents. A final, smaller package of the remaining non-exempt records must be released by April 10, 2002 and a Vaughn Index describing any withheld records to be due by April 25, 2002. DOE is on track to release all records relating to the NRDC request, as well as all other similar FOIA requests from other media organizations relating to the NEP, in a single "document dump" by close-of-business on Friday, March 22.

Speech to ATRA

[Acknowledgements]

Thank you all for inviting me here today. I would like to talk to you this morning about my job as Counsel to the President and also about the Administration's approach to civil justice reform issues. And then I would be happy to answer questions that you may have about any subject.

First of all, I could not help but notice that you have a panel later this morning that will discuss judicial elections. I will say definitively that I am very happy that I no longer have to run in judicial elections. Raising money is no fun. And without stealing any thunder, let me add my two cents to your panel: I personally oppose the election of judges.

I. Role of Counsel to the President

Of course, to me, running for elective office seems a part of the distant past. I have been President Bush's counsel in the White House for nearly 14 months. And a lot has happened. Thinking back over the last 14 months, what has really struck me is how important the integrity and honesty of the President are to the proper functioning of the Administration in general and the Counsel's office in particular. During the campaign, President Bush pledged repeatedly that he would uphold not just the laws of the land, but also the honor and dignity of the Presidency. And I think we all can be grateful that President Bush is as advertised: a man of integrity and of his word whom all Americans can respect and look to for principled leadership in times of peace and, as now, in times of war.

As Counsel to President Bush, much of my day-to-day job is necessarily reactive, responding to the crisis or issue at hand. But that said, standing here with the benefit of over a year of service, I can say that two core principles guide me in serving the Presidency and this President.

The first is fidelity to the rule of law. Several prior Counsels to the President have been criticized -- or worse -- for dis-serving the Presidency: for subordinating the rule of law to the political and personal interests. Knowing this history, the lawyers on my staff and I fully understand that the first principle that must influence and determine everything we do is fidelity to the rule of law.

The second principle is preservation and defense of the constitutional prerogatives of the Presidency. Those prerogatives are constantly tested and challenged: Congressional requests for documents of internal policy debates, Senatorial demands regarding nomination of judges, congressional attempts to ensure that certain Executive Branch agencies, or at least certain Executive Branch officers, operate independently of the President. One of the most important jobs we have in the Counsel's office is to preserve the powers and prerogatives of the Presidency against inappropriate congressional incursions.

II. Civil Justice Reform

Another aspect of my job is to participate, in conjunction with the President's domestic policy advisors and the relevant departments and agencies, in the development of legal policy. Civil justice reform is one part of that. So let me turn to that subject.

A. Background

We cannot begin to achieve meaningful civil justice reform without first convincing the American people and the Congress that there is a problem that needs fixing. When the issue of civil justice reform is described -- as is often is -- as big business against consumer or big business against labor, we have seen that meaningful reform is not likely to get very far.

So the first imperative continues to be educational -- to educate the Congress and the public on the problem and to show that proposals for reform will benefit consumers, labor, and shareholders.

The civil justice system must strongly protect consumers by ensuring that legitimate victims of corporate malfeasance can obtain justice and receive fair and just compensation. The issue is one of balance. We do not want a tort system that unduly sacrifices product development and innovation -- new drugs and new vaccines, for example. But we also do not want a legal system that unduly sacrifices safety -- allowing new drugs that have deadly side effects, for example. Finding the right balance so as to ensure appropriate standards of liability and appropriate damages awards is therefore a critical function of the tort system.

Apart from substance, we also want sensible and efficient litigation procedures to ensure that shareholders, employees, and plaintiffs are not penalized by waste and undue inefficiency in the litigation process.

On both substance and procedure, there is surely room for improvement. The existing tort regime is often characterized by excessive payouts, lottery-style awards, and an inequitable division of the spoils among claimants and counsel. It not only fails properly to deter unsafe conduct, but also often fails to compensate victims fully for their losses.

Escalating lawsuit abuse imposes enormous and varied costs on our economy. Consumers pay higher prices for fewer products. Shareholders lose value when stock prices drop as a result of a spurious lawsuit. Employees lose their jobs or receive reduced compensation as the companies for which they work are forced to cover excess litigation expense.

America's civil justice system is the most expensive in the industrialized world. The overall cost of our system is conservatively estimated at nearly $180 billion annually, or about 2 percent of GDP. And costs have grown steadily over time, up from only 1.3% of GDP in 1970, and approximately 0.6% in 1950.

Americans understand that the current system is broken. The better they understand the inequities of the system, the more inclined they will be to view civil justice reform favorably.

Of course, when we talk about the civil justice "system" in the singular, we ignore one major issue -- federalism. Lawsuits to recover damages for injuries are traditionally governed by state substantive law. And many in my party are appropriately cautious about the federal government stepping in to override substantive state law. To justify federal tort reform measures that would alter state tort law, therefore, one must convincingly show the relationship and effect of state tort law on the national economy and interstate markets.

B. Administration's Approach to Congress

Let me turn to the Administration's views on the civil justice reform outlook in Congress. The President spoke to this issue yesterday at his press conference and stated: "I am for reducing the number of lawsuits in our society. I think everybody will have their day in court, but I think a society that is so kind of litigious-oriented is one that is bad for jobs, bad for the creation of jobs. And . . . I will support reforms which reduce lawsuits and at the same time provide -- give people the opportunity to take their case to court."

On civil justice reform, as with any matter requiring legislation, we work very closely with Congress and must be aware of the views of Congress. It appears that meaningful civil justice reform in Congress is most likely to be accomplished not through one massive tort reform bill covering a slew of often controversial issues, but rather through targeted measures on specific bills related to specific issues -- whether that be a class action bill, a terrorism insurance bill, a patients bill of rights, a vaccine liability bill.

With that in mind, I want to focus on two pieces of proposed legislation that the Administration strongly supports and that are now before the Congress.

1. Class Action Legislation

The first relates to class action reform. As you know, one of today's major civil justice problems is class-action litigation. In many cases, defending on the merits is a bet-the-company strategy, as Judge Richard Posner noted some years ago. The threat of class certification inevitably leads to settlement because every good lawyer or savvy client knows that markets will respond to certification with a major drop in the stock price.

Right now, moreover, a handful of State courts, through their certification and settlement of large-scale class action lawsuits, are effectively making law and dictating corporate behavior for 49 other States. A class action lawsuit brought in State court may be removed to federal court only if there is full diversity among the defendants and the named plaintiffs. In addition, each class member's claim alone must exceed $75,000, even if the aggregate amount in controversy far exceeds this amount. These requirements make it easy for plaintiffs' lawyers to bring large class actions in favorable state forums, even where these lawsuits have significant interstate commerce implications and involve the residents and laws of multiple states.

The individual consumers on whose behalf these suits are brought often receive only a few dollars each from a class action settlement. Frequently, they do not even get cash, but instead receive a "coupon" for a noncash discount on one of the defendant's products. By contrast, the lawyers who bring the suits often negotiate very large fees.

To address these problems, the Administration strongly supports the Class Action Fairness Bill, H.R. 2341, currently before the House. The commonsense provisions in that bill include (1) notice of a lawsuit to class members in “plain English”; (2) judicial review of “coupon” settlements; and (3) prohibitions against court approval of proposed settlements providing for preferential payments to certain designated members of the class.

In addition, this bill calls for modification of diversity requirements for federal jurisdiction over class actions, such that cases would be removable if the aggregate amount in controversy exceeds $2,000,000 and there is minimal diversity. Federal jurisdiction for major class actions of this kind would help protect out-of-state defendants, as well as out-of-State plaintiff class members, from local biases in cases that affect their substantial interests and therefore is consistent with and fulfills the Constitution’s original design.

2. Procedures for mass tort terrorism cases.

I also want to talk briefly about one other important issue currently being debated in Congress -- the legal system’s handling of mass terrorism incidents. Congress has been debating for months how the legal system and the insurance industry will cope with additional terrorist attacks.

As to insurance, the Administration and most in Congress agree that some level of government backstop is necessary so that the insurance industry can manage the risk of future terrorism incidents and continue to provide coverage for major building projects, stadiums, air carriers, and the like.

A sticking point in passing any bill has concerned the appropriate litigation procedures for mass tort terrorism incidents. The Administration has proposed that sensible litigation procedures for mass terrorism incidents be part of any terrorism insurance bill.

Sensible litigation procedures for mass tort terrorism incidents are necessary for several reasons.

First, sensible litigation procedures will help reduce the substantial uncertainty faced by the insurance industry in pricing terrorism risk. The largest piece of the terrorism risk to insurers is likely to be the liability component of property and casualty insurance.

Second, absent sensible litigation procedures, the resources of liable defendants, including resources from their liability insurance policies, will not suffice to compensate the class of successful plaintiff-victims in mass tort terrorism incidents.

Third, the number and variety of cases, plaintiffs, defendants, causes of action, liability standards, and damages rules in mass tort terrorism cases will overwhelm the ordinary legal system and cause extraordinary delays.

The Administration advanced four proposals to respond to these issues.

First, tort cases arising out of a mass tort terrorism incident should be consolidated in a single federal court. This is a common procedure in mass tort cases and was a central feature of the legislation recently enacted by Congress for the tort cases arising out of the September 11 attacks.

Second, there should be no punitive damage awards in mass tort terrorism cases. In mass tort cases, only a limited pool of resources will be available to plaintiffs who prove liability (whether because of bankruptcy or settlement). Because of the limited pool of resources, it would be grossly inequitable and unfair to allow one plaintiff or class of plaintiffs to receive an excessive award -- including a punitive component entirely unrelated to the plaintiff's injuries and unnecessary to compensate the plaintiff -- that could greatly limit or outright preclude recovery by other plaintiffs.

Third, there should be no joint and several liability for non-economic damages in mass tort terrorism cases, but rather should be proportional fault for recovery of non-economic damages. Without such a provision, a court could hold any defendant “jointly and severally” liable for the full amount of the plaintiff’s non-economic damages, even for those damages attributable to the terrorists’ acts and unrelated to the defendant’s actions.

Fourth, the plaintiff’s recovery in mass terrorism cases should be offset by the amount of first-party insurance received by the plaintiff. This will ensure that injured parties receive appropriate compensation, but also preserve the pool of defendant assets and thereby allow equitable recovery for all injured parties.

I am pleased to report that the House of Representatives agreed with the Administration’s four proposals (and even added a fifth proposal to limit attorneys’ fees) and passed a strong bill at the end of last year.

That leaves the Senate.

In negotiations with the Senate, we thought we had achieved a good bipartisan agreement. The Administration -- along with key members of the Banking Committee, Democrat Senators Sarbanes and Dodd and Republican Senators Gramm and Enzi -- agreed that some sensible litigation procedures should be part of any terrorism insurance bill. In particular, there was a bipartisan agreement for two provisions: consolidation of claims in a single court and the elimination of punitive damages.

But just when we thought there was agreement, Senator Daschle intervened at the 11th hour and overrode his Senators, Sarbanes and Dodd, and prevented the bill from coming to the Senate floor. The sole ground on which Senator Daschle took this action were the liability procedures, modest and limited as they are.

The Administration remains deeply disappointed that Senate leadership took this extraordinary step and prevented the Senate from considering a bill that had wide bipartisan agreement. We are continuing to support a terrorism insurance bill with sensible litigation management procedures. But what happened in the Senate shows us all that any civil justice reform, no matter how sensible the proposal in question, will be a real fight in the Senate.

III. Conclusion

In closing, let me say how much we appreciate your efforts on behalf of reform. And please know that the Administration is committed to supporting sensible litigation procedures that will make our legal system as effective as possible. With that, I would be happy to answer questions.

Daschle: Ridge Must Inform Congress on Security

By Joanne Kenen

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle said on Wednesday he was considering how to persuade or compel Homeland Security Director Tom Ridge to testify before Congress and cited a recent snafu over giving student visas to dead hijackers as showing an embarrassing lapse in domestic defense.

Ridge, who has requested $38 billion for homeland defense next year, has declined to testify before House or Senate committees, although he has given informal briefings. The White House has said he does not have to testify because he is a presidential adviser, not a Cabinet secretary or agency head.

"He doesn't have to testify, he's part of my staff," President Bush told a news conference on Wednesday. "That's part of the prerogative of the executive branch of government, and we hold that very dear."

But Daschle said of Ridge, "He claims to be a simple adviser, and yet he's administering the entire war on terror, the homeland security effort is under his command."

The revelation this week that a Florida flight school had just received word of approval of student visas for the two men who piloted jets into the World Trade Center six months ago was "a major embarrassment and a recognition that we still have a lot of work to do," Daschle told reporters.

"We can't feel secure so long as mistakes of this magnitude are happening," the South Dakota Democrat added.

"If we can't have better communication in times of tranquillity, can you imagine what they will be in times of real crisis? I think you've got to ask those questions and again I am criticized for asking questions."

Daschle last month provoked a storm of Republican criticism when he questioned the future expansion of the war on terrorism. He praised Bush's leadership on the war so far, but called on the president to clarify its direction.

BUSH SAYS BREAKS BREAD WITH BOTH SIDES

Bush, who said he was "stunned and not happy" about the student visas for the pilots, said he does keep Congress informed on defense and security, partly through regular breakfasts with Daschle and other congressional leaders.

"I break bread with both Republicans and Democrats right back here in the Oval Office and have a good, honest discussion about plans, objectives, what's taking place, what's not taking place," he said.

Daschle said he was considering options including a Senate resolution urging Ridge to testify, a subpoena compelling his testimony, or legislation that would give the Homeland Security office statutory authority. Those options are not mutually exclusive, he said, adding that he personally did favor legislation to outline the office's statutory authority.

Several prominent Republicans have expressed concern about Ridge's reluctance to testify as well, and Daschle said he hopes any Senate action will be bipartisan.

Daschle said he was particularly perturbed because when Democrats and Republicans were squabbling in December about homeland defense funds, Ridge disagreed with Democrats' spending proposals for a data bank to track student visas.

Asked if he thought Ridge was doing a poor job, Daschle said he was inclined to give him the benefit of the doubt.

"I don't think anyone can say with any real competence how good a job he's doing or the office is doing, because we have such little information. I'm going to assume -- I'm going to certainly give Mr. Ridge and the administration the benefit of the doubt here," he said.

Daschle said he can understand why Ridge might not want to appear before dozens of House and Senate panels but should explain his plans and priorities to a few key ones.

Daschle: Ridge Must Inform Congress on Security

By Joanne Kenen

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle said on Wednesday he was considering how to persuade or compel Homeland Security Director Tom Ridge to testify before Congress and cited a recent snafu over giving student visas to dead hijackers as showing an embarrassing lapse in domestic defense.

Ridge, who has requested $38 billion for homeland defense next year, has declined to testify before House or Senate committees, although he has given informal briefings. The White House has said he does not have to testify because he is a presidential adviser, not a Cabinet secretary or agency head.

"He doesn't have to testify, he's part of my staff," President Bush told a news conference on Wednesday. "That's part of the prerogative of the executive branch of government, and we hold that very dear."

But Daschle said of Ridge, "He claims to be a simple adviser, and yet he's administering the entire war on terror, the homeland security effort is under his command."

The revelation this week that a Florida flight school had just received word of approval of student visas for the two men who piloted jets into the World Trade Center six months ago was "a major embarrassment and a recognition that we still have a lot of work to do," Daschle told reporters.

"We can't feel secure so long as mistakes of this magnitude are happening," the South Dakota Democrat added.

"If we can't have better communication in times of tranquillity, can you imagine what they will be in times of real crisis? I think you've got to ask those questions and again I am criticized for asking questions."

Daschle last month provoked a storm of Republican criticism when he questioned the future expansion of the war on terrorism. He praised Bush's leadership on the war so far, but called on the president to clarify its direction.

BUSH SAYS BREAKS BREAD WITH BOTH SIDES

Bush, who said he was "stunned and not happy" about the student visas for the pilots, said he does keep Congress informed on defense and security, partly through regular breakfasts with Daschle and other congressional leaders.

"I break bread with both Republicans and Democrats right back here in the Oval Office and have a good, honest discussion about plans, objectives, what's taking place, what's not taking place," he said.

Daschle said he was considering options including a Senate resolution urging Ridge to testify, a subpoena compelling his testimony, or legislation that would give the Homeland Security office statutory authority. Those options are not mutually exclusive, he said, adding that he personally did favor legislation to outline the office's statutory authority.

Several prominent Republicans have expressed concern about Ridge's reluctance to testify as well, and Daschle said he hopes any Senate action will be bipartisan.

Daschle said he was particularly perturbed because when Democrats and Republicans were squabbling in December about homeland defense funds, Ridge disagreed with Democrats' spending proposals for a data bank to track student visas.

Asked if he thought Ridge was doing a poor job, Daschle said he was inclined to give him the benefit of the doubt.

"I don't think anyone can say with any real competence how good a job he's doing or the office is doing, because we have such little information. I'm going to assume -- I'm going to certainly give Mr. Ridge and the administration the benefit of the doubt here," he said.

Lawmakers Slam White House 'Attitude Problem'
WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Lawmakers from both parties blistered the Bush administration on Thursday for "a severe attitude problem" in its dealings with Congress, citing a public campaign against their pet projects and Homeland Security chief Tom Ridge's refusal to testify on Capitol Hill. Appearing before a House of Representatives Appropriations subcommittee, White House Budget Director Mitch Daniels apologized for any "inadvertent" impression created that the White House was slighting Congress' constitutional role, but defended the effort to restrict the so-called earmarking of budget funds for programs in individual lawmakers' districts. "You and several others in the administration, in my view, have a severe attitude problem," said Wisconsin Rep. David Obey, the top Democrat on the Appropriations Committee, which wields considerable power through its control of the federal government's purse strings. "I sense you and other Cabinet members feel you could get about the people's business better if it wasn't for the small-minded and inconsequential rabble on Capitol Hill that you have to deal with," Obey said. The administration angered many lawmakers when it ridiculed a range of earmarked projects, including an $80,000 rescue sled backed by Obey for use on frozen lakes, in its recent budget request. The move was part of a drive to cut their numbers, which have doubled over the last two years to over 7,800. That anger has been fed by Ridge's refusal to testify on how the tens of billions of dollars set aside for U.S. homeland security efforts are being spent. The White House maintains he does not have to appear before Congress because he is a presidential adviser, not a Cabinet secretary or agency head.
BIPARTISAN CRITICISM
"I have to be direct, I am dissatisfied with both the quantity and quality of information coming out of the administration as it relates to homeland security," said Oklahoma Republican Rep. Ernest Istook, who chairs the Appropriations subcommittee on Treasury and General Government, which controls the White House's budget. "I hope that the lack of necessary information does not compel us to withhold funds for the priorities established by the president," he said. Obey added, "No information, no money." In response Daniels said that while he now hoped to mend fences with Congress on the earmarking question and it might be time "to let this subject go," lawmakers would also have to accept that times had changed since Sept. 11. "There are transcendent priorities; the protection of America and the defeat of a foe that's out to harm us," he said. "Individual and provincial and territorial priorities, however important they may be in isolation, may have to give way this year, will have to give way."

Daniels acknowledged the question of how Ridge should interact with Congress was a legitimate one, but said he could shed little light on it because it was outside his particular area.

"I will say this, I know ... the president and his support team absolutely affirm the constitutional importance of the Congress," he said. "There may be differences of interpretation when it gets to a single job."

Past Efforts to Stop Money Flow Ineffective; Coordination of U.S. Approach
May Be Key

By Karen DeYoung, Washington Post Staff Writer

Measures announced yesterday by President Bush to choke off terrorist finances have lengthened the list of people and organizations whose U.S. assets can be seized and expanded the legal basis for seizing them. Bush's executive order also made clear the administration's determination to punish those countries and overseas financial institutions that fail to respond to U.S. requests for help in finding and destroying the terrorist money trail.

But many of the financial weapons heralded yesterday, as well as other actions taken since the Sept. 11 attacks at the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, have been available for years in anti-terrorist law and the orders of previous presidents, or have lain dormant in dusty piles of United Nations resolutions and treaties.

A large part of the reason why those weapons have so far been unable to "starve the terrorists of funding," as Bush put it, is because the task is an extremely difficult one. Nine of the 27 groups and individuals Bush named yesterday, including, of course, Osama bin Laden and his al Qaeda organization, were already on lists long maintained by the State and Treasury departments. If anything will now make a difference, it is likely to be the amount of determination behind the administration's efforts to consolidate the U.S. effort and to put real muscle behind long-standing tools available to punish those here and abroad who fail to cooperate in the anti-terrorism fight. Until Sept. 11, the record of success was not an encouraging one under any administration, including the current one.

In addition to the sheer complication of the task, the search for funds in this country belonging to or destined for bin Laden and his associates, as well as a host of other terrorist groups, has always been hampered by lack of cooperation among U.S. government agencies.

Whether because of disbelief that a terrorist attack of such sophistication and magnitude could ever occur on U.S. soil, or a persistent inability to overcome barriers between the intelligence and law enforcement agencies on one side and the financial entities on the other, numerous previous efforts have failed to create an effective melding of disparate U.S. government effort.

In June 2000, a congressionally mandated commission examining U.S. counterterrorism efforts found that agencies all across the government had "information and authority that could be used to thwart terrorist fundraising." Yet the commission said that such information was often underused because agencies tended to distrust each other and because "there is no single entity that tracks and analyzes all the data available to the various agencies on terrorist fundraising in the United States."

The commission recommended the establishment of a joint task force consisting of all agencies with useful knowledge and databases. But although Congress provided money to establish the Foreign Terrorist Asset Tracking Center last October, there was no significant effort to get it up and running until two weeks ago.

On the international front, Secretary of State Colin L. Powell said yesterday, "we're going to take this initiative into the United Nations" to seek resolutions applying the U.S. financial actions worldwide. But previous, strongly worded U.N. Security Council resolutions, which have the force of international law, have failed to accomplish much.

In October 1999, the Security Council "demanded" that Afghanistan's ruling Taliban turn over bin Laden to a country where he had been indicted -- specifically, the United States, which had charged bin Laden with responsibility for the 1998 bombing of U.S. embassies in East Africa. A resolution last December repeated that demand and called on all U.N. member states "to freeze without delay funds and other financial assets of Usama bin Laden and individuals and entities associated with him."

In his announcement, Bush noted that the United States "has signed, but not yet ratified, two international conventions, one of which is designed to set international standards for freezing financial assets." The treaty, which the United States helped write, provides a framework for international cooperation in finding and freezing terrorist money.

But during the nearly two years since the United States signed it, neither the Clinton nor the Bush administration made any effort to press a disinterested Senate to ratify the accord.

In letters last week to Powell and Attorney General John D. Ashcroft, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, asked for quick submission of the treaty-implementing legislation needed for ratification. Passing Biden's letter in the mail was a missive from the State Department declaring the treaty "important," noting that "we would like to see prompt advice and consent" and promising that the necessary legislation would be provided "shortly."

The most attention-getting part of Bush's executive order was a renewed prohibition against all financial transactions with named terrorist individuals and organizations, and the freezing of any assets that belonged to or were destined for them. But finding and freezing the money in the past has proven far easier said than done.

In a 1995 executive order, Clinton released a list of 12 "foreign terrorist" organizations, all of them operating in the context of the Israeli-Palestinian dispute. He ordered their U.S. assets seized and prohibited "any transaction or dealing by United States persons or within the United States in property or interests in property of the persons designated." A separate order in 1999 added bin Laden and his al Qaeda organization to the list.

So far, the number of cases brought under those orders can be counted on little more than one hand. Nearly all have involved individuals and organizations whose money was allegedly being funneled to the Palestinian groups Hezbollah and Hamas. None of it has related directly to bin Laden or al Qaeda.

The first, and still the most well-known case was that of Mohammed Salah (not the Muhammad Salah named on yesterday's new list), a U.S. citizen associated with the Quranic Literacy Institute, a Chicago-based Islamic group whose public mission was to translate the Koran into English.

Salah, who served time in Israel on a terrorism charge, had long been considered a senior operative for Hamas. Although he was never charged with a crime in this country, federal prosecutors in 1998 seized about $ 100,000 from his bank account, along with about $ 1 million from the Institute.

Today, although it never got its money back, the institute continues to translate the Koran, and Salah, according to his attorney, drives a Chicago taxi.

Most recently, on Sept. 5, 80 federal agents raided InfoCom Corp., a Texas-based Internet-services company, and seized information from the office computers. The Palestinian-owned company, which serves as host for a number of Arab Web sites, is tied both through its directorate and its across-the-street location in Richardson, Tex., to the Holy Land Foundation, which provides charitable assistance to the needy in the Middle East. American Jewish groups have long alleged that the foundation funnels money to Hamas, but U.S. officials have lacked proof and no federal action has been taken against it.

Government sources said that the raid was part of an investigation of possible terrorist financial activity, but all records relating to the case have been sealed in a Dallas federal court.

Bush Moves to Cut Terrorists' Support; Foreign Banks Urged to Help Freeze Assets of 27 Entities
By Mike Allen and Paul Blustein, Washington Post Staff Writers

President Bush yesterday ordered U.S. financial institutions to freeze any assets belonging to Osama bin Laden and 26 other people and groups suspected of funding terrorists, and threatened retribution against overseas banks that do not follow suit.

With special operations troops and aircraft carriers heading toward Afghanistan in the biggest military mobilization since the Persian Gulf War, Bush said he will use "all the elements of our national and international power" to "starve the terrorists of funding."

The president acknowledged that most of the money fueling bin Laden's al Qaeda network is beyond U.S. borders. And experts on money-laundering pointed out that past efforts to cripple bin Laden, including a 1998 executive order by President Bill Clinton, have failed in part because the sources of his financing are so hard to find.

But administration officials said Bush's effort, which he called "the international financial equivalent of law enforcement's 'Most Wanted' list," is broader than the three anti-terrorist executive orders issued by Clinton. Bush's version expands the targets from terrorists operating in the Middle East to those operating anywhere in the world, enlarges the coverage to those who support the groups and promises to deny access to U.S. financial markets to foreign banks that do not cooperate. Bush and other administration officials have repeatedly held bin Laden responsible for the Sept. 11 attacks on the Pentagon and World Trade Center. But the president said yesterday that he will not authorize release of all the information gathered by the administration that establishes a direct link between bin Laden and the attacks. Bush said that in assembling the financial targets and naming bin Laden as the prime suspect in the attacks, the United States is "acting based on clear evidence, much of which is classified, so it will not be disclosed."

Secretary of State Colin L. Powell said Sunday on ABC's "This Week" that the administration would "put before the world, the American people, a persuasive case" that bin Laden's network was responsible.

But Powell, appearing with Bush, seconded the president's observation that most of the information is classified. He said that as the information is reviewed, if unclassified details are found "and it will allow us to share this information with the public, we will do so."

White House press secretary Ari Fleischer, in a humorous reference to Washington jargon, said he was told such disclosures can be expected "State Department soon," suggesting they are not imminent.

Bush said he chose yesterday's formal Rose Garden setting for his announcement on asset seizures as a way to underscore that the war on terrorism will be fought on many fronts and to remind the American people that patience will be required.

"You bet there's a concern about whether or not we'll be able to wrap up every financial instrument used to fund terrorism," he said. "But make no mistake about it: We're going after them all. And we'll win, we're going to win. Terrorists are going to realize they can't face down freedom. Terrorists are going to realize they made a big mistake, they miscalculated America. And I think they miscalculate a lot of our allies and friends, too."

Later in the day, Bush formally notified Congress of his deployment of troops and hardware to the Central and Pacific Command areas. He said he may "find it necessary to order additional forces into these and other areas of the world."

Most of the groups targeted by Bush are based in Africa, the Middle East and Central Asia. One, Abu Sayyaf Group, operates from the Philippines.

Three groups -- Makhtab Al-Khidamat/Al Kifah, Al Rashid Trust and the Wafa Humanitarian Organization -- are described by the Treasury Department as "would-be charitable organizations." Fleischer said Americans may have unwittingly contributed to them.

Not on the list are three groups -- Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad -- that are frequently denounced by the United States. Still, they receive support from countries seen as potential members of the coalition Bush is trying to build against bin Laden.

"We're putting banks and financial institutions around the world on notice," Bush said. "We will work with their governments, ask them to freeze or block terrorists' ability to access funds in foreign accounts. If they fail to help us by sharing information or freezing accounts, the Department of the Treasury now has the authority to freeze their banks' assets and transactions in the United States."

Treasury officials said that under yesterday's order, the U.S. entity holding the funds may not transfer them to anyone else. Banking officials said the money will probably be held in escrow, earning interest, until the block is lifted. In past cases, the money has been used to pay off debts to U.S. creditors.

A former senior Clinton administration official called the move "an incremental, useful step, but not a silver bullet." The official said the move would "dry up the legitimate banking system for bin Laden, although we've pretty much done that," but said it cannot prevent his use of underground and Islamic banking systems.

Jack Blum, a Washington lawyer and money-laundering expert who is a former special counsel to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Bush's order breaks new ground because the United States has "been reluctant to impose sanctions on foreign financial institutions, and the sanctions could be very effective." Blum called the measure a useful start, but compared it to catching water in a sieve.

Some diplomats said it was too early to know how their governments would react to the financial demands by the administration, but a European Union diplomat was enthusiastic. "We're doing exactly the same as the U.S.," said Matthew King, financial attache at the EU delegation in Washington. "Quite a lot of significant actions have taken place recently -- a number of accounts were closed down in London over the weekend."

Thomas L. Farmer, general counsel of the Bankers' Association for Finance and Trade, which represents the international interests of U.S. banks, said his members "are relieved to be told what they're expected to do" and said they already have begun adjusting their software to help them comply.

Continuing his consultations with foreign leaders, Bush yesterday had lunch with Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chretien and discussed ways to make the border less permeable for terrorists. As the two posed for photographers, Bush brought up his failure to mention Chretien in his address to Congress last week, which was taken as a snub by some in Ottawa. "I didn't necessarily think it was important to praise a brother," Bush said. "After all, we're talking about family."

Bush, who spoke for nearly an hour on Saturday with Russian President Vladimir Putin, revealed that on the day of the attacks Putin had agreed not to heighten the alert status of his troops in response to the higher U.S. alert status -- evidence, Bush said, that Putin "understands the Cold War is over."

Early today, Reuters reported that Saudi Arabia had cut its ties with the Taliban leaders in Afghanistan, where bin Laden is believed to be living.

"Because the Taliban government did not pay attention to all the contacts and attempts made by the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia to persuade it to stop harbouring criminals and terrorists . . . the government of the kingdom of Saudi Arabia announces cutting off all its relations with the Taliban government," an official Saudi statement said.

Bush also met privately with about 50 relatives of the passengers and crew of United Flight 93, which crashed in Pennsylvania Sept. 11 after a group of passengers apparently rushed the hijackers after hearing that other hijacked planes had been flown into the World Trade Center.

On the legislative front, Bush narrowed his request to Congress concerning the waiving of U.S. economic sanctions against Pakistan and India. In a presidential directive Saturday night, Bush had activated waiver provisions in sanctions that have restricted economic assistance to both countries since they exploded nuclear devices in 1998.

The new request would allow the United States to provide military assistance to Pakistan that is currently prohibited because of its 1999 military coup, and because it has not paid outstanding debts to the United States. Neither of those congressionally mandated sanctions contains presidential waiver authority.

The new proposal, sent to Capitol Hill late yesterday morning, replaced a much broader request for five-year presidential waiver authority over all existing U.S. aid sanctions against any country, if Bush determined it would help the war against terrorism.

The blanket provision would have allowed Bush to waive existing sanctions in every category, including human rights abuses, state-sponsored terrorism and nuclear weapons proliferation.

A NATION CHALLENGED: THE INVESTIGATION;
U.S. SET TO WIDEN FINANCIAL ASSAULT
By JUDITH MILLER with KURT EICHENWALD

Widening the financial assault on Osama bin Laden, administration officials are preparing to freeze the assets of about two dozen more charities and other organizations that are suspected of providing money and support to his terrorist operations, government officials said yesterday.

Officials tracking Mr. bin Laden's Al Qaeda network say they have found a sophisticated financial infrastructure that stretches from the United Arab Emirates to Europe to Indonesia, and uses mechanisms as varied as charitable organizations, manufacturing companies and credit card fraud to raise money and move it around the globe. Investigators say one focus of their hunt is Mustafa Ahmad, who they contend helped arrange the financing of the Sept. 11 attacks and plays a broader role in the finances of Mr. bin Laden's group. Federal agents have evidence that money was wired between Mr. Ahmad and Mohamed Atta, identified as a leading figure in the plot, in the days before the attacks.

Two other hijacking suspects wired Mr. Ahmad more than $10,000 just hours before their deaths, investigative documents show.

The authorities in the United Arab Emirates have said Mr. Ahmad, who had been visiting the country on a Saudi Arabian passport, left for Pakistan that day.

Federal officials say their effort to choke off Mr. bin Laden's money is an important front in the war on terrorism. Last week, the Bush administration froze the assets of 27 individuals and organizations linked to Mr. bin Laden.

The new list of suspect organizations, now under review by a group of officials led by Treasury Department representatives, includes charities in Saudi Arabia and Chicago, an Arab bank and at least three "hawalas," the informal money-lending networks common in the Arab world. The list is expected to be announced within two weeks.

Privately, Treasury Department officials are urging other governments to freeze assets in the countries that are linked to Mr. bin Laden. "That is the key to this entire effort," one administration official said.

In addition, officials said they were investigating more than 200 other financial entities suspected of aiding or being used by Mr. Bin Laden.

The list of entities is considered delicate, officials said, because the administration wants to prevent suspected individuals and institutions from moving their assets to safety before the targets are officially unveiled. When officials announced the list of organizations last week, they knew few had assets in this country, but an official said some assets overseas had been moved to safety.

The administration is taking aim at organizations with links to Mr. bin Laden's operations. But senior officials decided at a meeting late last week that to monitor and control Al Qaeda's financial assets, the United States and its allies would have to track the broader financial networks of Hamas, Hezbollah and other terrorist groups that Mr. bin Laden occasionally taps for his activities.

Investigators have found traces of money they contend are connected to Mr. bin Laden's activities in a variety of entities. There is evidence that representatives of terrorist groups affiliated with the terror network have trained operatives in the United States to raise money by running credit card scams and food stamp fraud. Also, government officials say, terrorist groups have used wealthy commercial ventures as fronts for moving money, as well as people, around the world.

American officials have long suspected that worldwide charitable organizations have provided critical financial or logistical support to a number of international terrorist attacks. But the government has found it difficult to strike at them. Most of the groups, especially those affiliated with Arab governments, one official said, support legitimate relief efforts and terrorist activities. Sometimes, he added, only a small number of officials in the charity are involved in terrorism. But the Sept. 11 attacks have changed the United States' stance toward those groups.

One organization that officials have strongly recommended including on the list being circulated within the administration is the Benevolence International Foundation. The group has portrayed itself as a purely humanitarian organization. The Saudi-based group, with offices in Waterloo, Ontario, and in Palos Hills, Ill., raised almost $2.2 million in the United States last year, according to its financial statements.

The group says it is dedicated to helping those harmed by war or natural disaster, and "is currently on the ground in Manhattan trying to determine how best BIF can assist aid and relief efforts to the victims" of the terrorist attack at the World Trade Center.

But statements by the organization's representatives, as well as videos and written information distributed by it, repeatedly glorify martyrdom by Muslims in pursuit of jihad, or holy war, said Steve Emerson, a writer and commentator on terrorism who has long pressed Washington to crack down on this charity and other Islamic nonprofit groups that he says support terrorism.

One video circulated by the group, Mr. Emerson says, features an interview with a father of an Arab-Afghan holy warrior who died in Zenica, Bosnia, near the regional headquarters of Benevolence International.

"I was blessed with his martyrdom," the father says, according to a translation provided by Mr. Emerson. "Our history is glorious and our religion is mighty."

According to one of the group's newsletters last year, seven of the charity's officers were killed in battle last year in Chechnya and Bosnia.

A telephone message left yesterday at Benevolence International's office in Palos Hills was not answered.

Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the Saudi ambassador to the United States, said in an interview for a New York Times/"Frontline" documentary that giving money to charity was required by Islam and that Riyadh had no evidence that money from any Saudi-based charity went to Al Qaeda. He also said Saudi efforts to trace suspect money went from the kingdom to Europe, and in many cases, to the United States, where the trail ended.

Administration officials are also recommending that an American charity be included on the new list -- the Global Relief Foundation, which provides emergency relief, medical aid and engages in other humanitarian efforts around the world.

Global Relief, based in Bridgeview, Ill., long a hub of militant Islamic activity, is also making an appeal on its Web site for victims of the catastrophes at the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, though it does not refer to them as terrorist attacks.

Global Relief was originally included two years ago on a list circulated by the Clinton administration of 30 organizations with suspected ties to terrorism. But in an interview last year Stanley Cohen, a lawyer for Global Relief, called the investigations of the foundation "another of the government's pathetic attempts to sully committed Islamic organizations."

Dear Community Leader:

As you may know, the lack of a government backstop for terrorism insurance is causing insurance rates to skyrocket and, even worse, preventing new projects from going forward. Last year, we came close to a legislative solution, but it foundered on the shoals of tort reform.

I have worked with Treasury Secretary O'Neill on a new approach that should avoid these perils. The approach is a simple one. The federal government will pick up uninsured losses if there is another terrorist attack. I believe it can receive bipartisan support in both houses of Congress.

I am sending you a copy of this proposal. If you support it, please let your senators and congressmen know. If you have any questions, please contact Kate Scheeler in my Washington office at 202-224-6542. And, as always, please let me know if I can be of help to you in any way.

Sincerely,

Charles Schumer
U.S. Senate
SCHUMER PROPOSAL

SECTION. 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Terrorism Risk Insurance Act of 2002."

SEC. 2. TERRORISM RISK INSURANCE PROGRAM AUTHORIZED.--

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish a terrorism risk insurance program to compensate U.S. persons for up to $100,000,000,000 in aggregate economic losses of the type that are typically covered under property and casualty insurance policies, including business interruption coverage, resulting from any act of terrorism that occurs on or after the date of enactment of this Act through June 30, 2005. The Secretary shall compensate persons pursuant to this Act only if both the person and the appropriate State insurance commissioner certify that the person has not been able to obtain reasonably priced insurance coverage in the private sector for economic losses resulting from acts of terrorism. The Secretary has discretionary authority to assess premiums on those certified. Any determination of the Secretary as to whether or not to pay compensation, or as to the appropriate amount of any compensation, under this Act shall be final and shall not be subject to judicial review.

SEC. 3. ACT OF TERRORISM DEFINED.--

(a) CERTIFICATION.--The term Act of terrorism@ means any act that is certified by the Secretary -- (1) to be a violent act or an act that is dangerous to human life, property, or infrastructure; (2) to have resulted in damage within the United States, or to an air carrier (as defined in section 40102 of title 49, United States Code) regardless of where the loss occurs; and (3) to have been committed by an individual or individuals acting on behalf of any foreign person or foreign interest, as part of an effort to coerce the civilian population of the United States or to influence the policy or affect the conduct of the United States Government by coercion.

(b) LIMITATION.--No act or event shall be certified by the Secretary as an act of terrorism if (1) the act or event is committed in the course of a war declared by the Congress; or (2) losses resulting from the act or event, in the aggregate, do not exceed $5,000,000.

(c) DETERMINATIONS FINAL.-- Any certification of, or determination not to certify, an act or event as an act of terrorism under this paragraph shall be final and shall not be subject to judicial review.

SEC. 4. PAYMENT AUTHORITY.-- This Act constitutes budget authority in advance of appropriations Acts, and represents the obligation of the Federal Government to pay up to $100,000,000,000 in compensation for economic losses determined by the Secretary to be covered under this Act.

SEC. 5. GENERAL AUTHORITIES.--The Secretary shall have the powers and authorities necessary to implement this Act, including authority to prescribe regulations and procedures. Such regulations and procedures may include, but not be limited to, guidelines for certification and for assessment of premiums. The United States shall have the right of subrogation with respect to any payment made by the United States under this Act.

Explanation of Proposed Terrorism Risk Insurance Act of 2002

The proposed bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to establish a temporary (3 year) terrorism risk insurance program to protect taxpayers and reduce economic instability caused by the current lack of affordable commercial property and casualty insurance coverage for terrorism risk in the wake of the September 11 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The proposed bill recognizes the federal government's interest in stabilizing the economy during this period of uncertainty about possible future terrorist attacks. It offers a simpler, yet effective, alternative to other terrorism insurance bills.

Specifically, the proposed terrorism risk insurance program would --

- ~ provide compensation to U.S. persons, up to an aggregate cap of $100 billion, for economic losses, of the type typically covered under property and casualty insurance for future acts of terrorism, subject to certification by that person or persons and by the appropriate state insurance commissioner, that the person or persons have been unable to obtain reasonably priced insurance coverage for losses resulting from acts of terrorism

- ~ limit federal government exposure by narrowly defining the term "act of terrorism," requiring federal certification by the Secretary of the Treasury that an act of terrorism has occurred, limiting the duration of the program and providing a federal right of subrogation with respect to any payment made under the Act

- ~ provide congressional payment authority for the program, and

- ~ authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to implement the Act and the program, including authority to prescribe regulations and procedures

Under the proposed bill, the terrorism risk insurance program would provide direct compensation for victims of future terrorist attacks who have been unable to secure private sector insurance coverage. The Secretary of the Treasury would have discretionary authority to charge a premium for such coverage. By providing direct, full compensation for economic losses, the proposed bill: 1) recognizes the responsibility of the federal government to assure insurance protection against potential future attacks 2) avoids issues raised last year regarding the level and amount of private insurers' retention and 3) reflects what appeared to be the consensus reached last year that taxpayer dollars should not be used to compensate for non-economic losses, such as punitive damage

Funny you all should be on this. I was just collecting a package of data to discuss with Jami, but I will share it here.

Here's the whole picture as I got it this morning from GAO's Carolyn Black Bagdoyan, who called to push for an entry meeting this week on China job 320104:

The following GAO work program on China and WTO has been requested on a bipartisan basis by the Chairs of the Senate Finance Committee (Bacchus and Grassley) and the Chairs of the House Ways and Means Committee (Thomas and Rangel). When I asked whether the elected officials had really work out such detail and inquired what staffers GAO had worked with, Carolyn said that the GAO work program on China WTO had actually been developed with Ted

Posner, Trade Majority Trade Counsel for the Senate Finance Subcommittee on Trade; Richard Khriss, the Subcommittee's Minority Trade Counsel; Angela Ellard, Staff Director (for Ways and Means or one of its Subcommittees?) and

Tim Reis, Chief Trade Counsel for Ways and Means or one of its Subcommittees. ACTION SUGGESTED: It would really be good if someone in H pulsed these folks to see how much Congressional pull and how much GAO push was involved in this work program. The program and the detailed document request (including suggested TAGS for us to use) is not the work of an elected official. Here's the five year work program:

* Five different GAO jobs of which four will be repeated annually from now until 2005, i.e. four reports each.

These jobs include:

* #320047-a self-initiated GAO business survey that does not much involve State this year. This will become an annual Business Survey to be given a separate job number starting next year.

* #320088-to identify and annually monitor Chinese obligations under WTO

* #320104-to identify Chinese performance indicators and annually track compliance with its WTO agreements

* XXXX-a yet to be announced study starting in the fall to monitor WTO enforcement involving China

* XXX-the yet to be announced annual business survey that will supplant #320047

I asked Carolyn to send me a one page GAO summary of the above to ensure that I can accurately represent it and can explain it to people here. She said she would have to check with her boss as to whether she could do this. I told her that we could not possibly organize the entry meeting for #320104 this week as she hoped, but that we would aim for the latter part of the first week in April when she and her group return from China. In the meantime, she said, she hoped we would be pulling the documentation GAO has requested together so that some of it would be available at the April entry meeting. (We are trying to get an electronic copy of the four page faxed request dated March 11 so that we can share it more easily in the Department.) Among other things, it requests what it says they have requested from USTR:

- * records of communication between US and Chinese officials;
- * Instructions and "talking points"/"backgrounders" prepared for US delegations to China and Geneva...
- * Information about other WTO members' actions and positions...
- * Documentation of the activities of the Trade Policy Staff Committee Subcommittee on China WTO Compliance
- * ETC.

In particular, Carolyn asked about the possibility of getting electronic versions of the six categories of cables they want, asking why we could not make such available when ITA does. (I said I no idea about ITA but that only people on our system can get electronic cables and GAO is not on our system.) Carolyn also noted that GAO wants a monthly cable update on China WTO from now until 2005. Since I had not seen the document request, in addition to dismissing the possibility of electronic cable takes, I simply flagged my consternation and concern about GAO is doing so many jobs on one subject (GAO insists each segment is a stand alone.) and that it presumes to do real time monitoring of negotiations, as opposed to evaluating/auditing past actions. Carolyn took umbrage at my question of whether GAO might not have the right to do real time monitoring of China WTO and said she would have to refer that issue to their attorney. I noted that further discussion of this whole work program will probably be necessary because of the questions/issues it raises but that we will aim for an entry meeting on #320104 in early April.

ACTION PROPOSED: I think we need a meeting of L, H, EAP, M, M/P, RM and EB on this package to assess State's interests and determine whether the timing and the issues are such that we need to 1) pick a fight on this one or whether we want to 2) make book on this for the Senior Dialogue (hopefully in April) or 3) just get on with it and bear the burden GAO is levying on the China Desk and turn over anything GAO wants on China WTO. The last option is simplest, in which case I also suggest that we save the taxpayer the cost of having two teams do China WTO and instead fire the current group and hire the one that Congress will listen to and take briefings from, providing that they are also prepared to do all the other work involved as well.

Please let me know your thoughts and reactions vis a vis the China WTO GAO work program and whether the proposed meeting makes sense. The real point here is that any contention of GAOs right to anything on this is likely to bring big guns into play and State leadership will need to be prepared to hang tough and wither the fire. How ready for a fight are we? What are our chances of winning? at what cost? Stephanie -- GAO makes a prospective request for cables to be produced, on a monthly basis, for the duration of the investigation (open-ended). Is it our practice to comply with such requests?

Keith, we just received this today as a heads up; the formal request will come via Michelle Carter (RM - former FMP). I would like to discuss ASAP, particularly since a GAO del is traveling to Beijing this weekend and will be in China for two weeks. I think it is important that we work out what and how we share soonest. Please give me a call. Thanks, Mary

TALKING POINTS
REQUEST FOR GOVERNOR RIDGE TO TESTIFY

Governor Ridge has been asked to testify before Congress. The Administration believes strongly that the Governor) as one of the President,s closest advisors) should be held to the long-standing practice that precludes such advisors from testifying.

The Administration recognizes the needs of Congress to receive information to perform its constitutional responsibilities. Governor Ridge has offered and held numerous meetings and briefings with Members of Congress. The Governor will continue to work closely with Congress, including the relevant Committees, in a manner consistent with this long-standing practice (well-established).

Why the Director of Homeland Security should not testify
ú Presidents of both parties, for over 50 years, have taken the position that their closest advisers cannot be forced to testify before Congress on policy matters. This position, based on the Constitution's separation of powers, has long been accepted by the Congress.

ú Governor Ridge is the President,s chief advisor on homeland security issues. As an Assistant to the President, a non-confirmed position, he has no authority to hire or fire, except in his immediate office.

ú The Director of Homeland Security serves as a coordinator between various agencies and departments. The National Security Advisor, who has a similar coordinating role between agencies does not testify, nor does the White House Chief of Staff.

ú Administrations of both parties have adhered to this position, except for instances involving substantial allegations of personal or official wrongdoing.

ú There are White House officials who regularly testify before Congress. These include statutorily created offices that involve positions requiring Senate confirmation, such as the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisors, and the Director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Meeting Congress, Need for Information

ú Administration officials with operational and budgetary authority, including the Secretary of Defense and the Attorney General, have repeatedly testified before Congress on homeland security matters. They have also provided Members of Congress with periodic briefings.

ú Governor Ridge, although he does not have operational authority, has made himself available to meet with Members of Congress on an ongoing basis. He has repeatedly reached out to the bipartisan leadership of the Senate, and most recently met with the Senate caucuses of both parties.

Moving forward in the future.

ú The Administration and Governor Ridge recognize that the country faces significant issues regarding homeland security and that it will take the cooperation of both branches working together to solve them.

ú The Administration is committed to meeting Congressional needs for information consistent with constitutional principles, and will continue to meet with Members of Congress and brief committees on an ongoing basis.

Brett, would you please review the proposed admin alert I drafted and let me know if okay to send. The intent is to make sure the collection of this information is on everyone's radar screen and takes place in a systematic fashion so that there is as much material as possible from which to establish a Bush Library at the appropriate time.

Thanks.

D R A F T: Proposed Administrative Alert
BUSH LIBRARY MATERIALS

We would appreciate your help collecting items related to presidential events and sending one original of each to us for possible inclusion in the future Bush Library. These would include items of special historical interest as well as some of the routine items your office might produce as project officer for an event.

For example, we need everything from backdrops from events to items the President has worn to participate in events to tickets and/or invitations to events. Examples include:

- caps/hats he has worn at events
- jackets worn (to throw out first pitch at World Series)
- the ball he pitched at the World Series
- a tool belt worn to work on a project
- tickets to T-Ball games
- program for the Ford's Theater event
- menus from state dinners and other special occasions
- invitations to events
- brochures that highlight issues/programs
- nicely bound/printed copies of Presidential speeches/remarks
- samples of all mementos/trinkets developed for the Administration

Please send these items to me as you collect them, and we will store them safely. When in doubt about whether something would be useful, please send it anyway.

Thanks for your cooperation in planning ahead to make the future Bush Presidential Library as visually compelling as possible. Your comments are also welcome.

TALKING POINTS

REQUEST FOR GOVERNOR RIDGE TO TESTIFY

Governor Ridge has been asked to testify before Congress. The Administration believes strongly that the Governor – as one of the President’s closest White House advisors – should adhere to the long-standing practice under which such close Presidential advisors do not testify before Congress.

The Administration recognizes the needs of Congress to receive information to perform its constitutional responsibilities. Governor Ridge has offered and held numerous meetings and briefings with Members of Congress. The Governor will continue to work closely with Congress, including the relevant Committees, in a manner consistent with this long-standing practice. Just as significantly, each of the departments and agencies with operational and budget authority will also continue to work with and testify before the Congress.

Why the Director of Homeland Security should not testify

- Presidents of both parties, for at least 50 years, have taken the position that their closest advisers cannot be forced to and ordinarily will not testify before Congress on policy matters. This position, based on the Constitution's separation of powers, has long been accepted by the Congress.
- Governor Ridge is the President’s chief advisor on homeland security issues. As an Assistant to the President, a non-confirmed position, he has no authority to hire or fire, except in his immediate office.
- The Director of Homeland Security serves as a coordinator between various agencies and departments. The National Security Advisor, who has a similar coordinating role between agencies, does not testify, nor do the White House Chief of Staff, Counsel, and other officials.
- Administrations of both parties have adhered to this position, except for instances involving substantial evidence of personal or official wrongdoing. Three examples have been cited where White House officials have testified during WWII, all of which involve congressional investigations of personal or official wrongdoing. Donald Nelson testified in response to an inquiry into numerous allegations of financial corruption within the government’s war effort. Donald Dawson was investigated for accepting cash and other favors for providing favorable treatment on loan applications. Jonathan Daniels was called to testify regarding allegations that he had improperly forced the head of the REA to resign over a particular decision.
- Officials within the Executive Office of the President that serve in Senate confirmed positions in statutorily-created agencies regularly testify before Congress. These offices include the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisors, and the Director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Meeting Congress' Need for Information

- The Administration and Governor Ridge have regularly met with Congress and provided extensive information on homeland security.
- Governor Ridge assumed his responsibilities October 8, 2001. Since that time Governor Ridge and his staff have held over 100 meetings with Members of Congress and staff, and briefed various committees in the House and Senate. He has also repeatedly reached out to the bipartisan leadership of the Senate, and most recently met with the Senate caucuses of both parties. And, he has offered to meet with the committees of jurisdiction in a non-testimonial format at their convenience.
- During this short period of time, Governor Ridge has been working with the relevant executive branch departments and agencies on important homeland security issues such as Border Reorganization, the Threat Alert System, anthrax and bioterrorism, food safety, and ensuring security at home at events such as the Olympics, and the Super Bowl.
- Governor Ridge does not have operational or budget authority over any federal agency except his own office within the White House. The Threat Alert System is an example of an initiative that the Governor coordinated with various agencies which was ultimately turned over to DOJ for a period of comment, and DOJ will eventually handle the actual operation of the program.
- Administration officials with operational and budgetary authority, including the Secretary of Defense and the Attorney General, have repeatedly testified before Congress on homeland security matters. They have also provided Members of Congress with periodic briefings.

Moving forward in the future.

- The Administration and Governor Ridge recognize that the country faces significant issues regarding homeland security and that it will take the cooperation of both branches working together to solve them.
- The Administration is committed to meeting Congressional needs for information consistent with the principle of separation of powers.
- Governor Ridge looks forward to continuing to meet with Members of Congress, the 14 committees with jurisdiction over homeland security, and to brief committees on an ongoing basis.

Response to Specific Examples of testimony during WWII

Questions have been raised about three Presidential advisors who testified during World War II. Those examples only support the conclusion that Presidential advisors do not ordinarily testify on policy matters.

The three examples raised all appear to involve congressional investigations of personal or official wrongdoing, which is the one situation in which Presidential advisors often have testified in the past and which is distinct from testimony about policy matters.

- Donald Nelson apparently was one of the corporate executive "dollar a year" men whom Congress investigated as part of its inquiry into numerous allegations of financial corruption within the government's war effort. In addition, Nelson held a position as head of the War Production Board that, under the executive order creating it, gave him a degree of formal authority over agencies that close Presidential advisors ordinarily do not possess.
- Donald Dawson was investigated for accepting cash and other favors for providing favorable treatment on loan applications.
- Jonathan Daniels was called to testify regarding allegations that he had improperly forced the head of the REA to resign over a particular decision.

The Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies is hosting the biggest Gala of the year. They have invited the President to speak. The concern is that the dinner is a fundraising event. This information is a follow-up to what you were requesting.

The organization is an Afrucan-American "think tank." The are a 501-3 (c) not for profit entity.

Here are the table levels:

$50,000 Leadership
$30,000 Chairman
$15,000 Sponsor
$10,000 Patron

Individual tickets: $500

They are expecting 1,000 - 1,200 attendees.

The dinner is slated for March 26, 2002.

Let me know if there is a conflict of interest.

Thanks again for your help.

SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE
Testimony Statement of Mark Weinberger
Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Tax Policy

March 21, 2002

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Ranking Member and other members of the Committee, thank you for inviting the Treasury Department to testify today on the important issue of abusive tax avoidance transactions. We appreciate very much, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee has given us the time to complete our evaluation because we believe that what we have learned will result in more effective rules. Treasury's testimony today will highlight the measures necessary to address abusive tax avoidance transactions. Our proposals include administrative actions we already are beginning to undertake, as well as legislative proposals. Our administrative and legislative initiatives are similar in many respects to the proposals considered by your staff in the draft legislation they previously produced.

The goal we all share is to ensure that each taxpayer pays its fair share of tax. We do not wish to interfere with legitimate business tax planning, but we must curb abusive
